Campus support much needed for Fight Night

Tonight at 6 there will be some definite basketball action at Bramlage Coliseum thanks to Fright Night Five.

There will be candy and face painting by various campus organizations. The cheerleaders and Classy Cats will be performing, as well.

The most important element is to show our teams that we are behind them 100 percent. They should know that we are not all fair-weather fans, as some have claimed throughout this rocky football season.

It is time that we started paying more attention, thus giving more credit, to both the men's and women's basketball teams. These are athletes who work extremely hard, both on and off the court. They have to strive to maintain a level of excellence in the classroom, as well as superior physical prowess in order to handle the pressures on the court.

It will be the fans' first chance to see the 2000-01 teams up close. It is also a wonderful opportunity to get to see the new men's' head coach Jim Wooldridge.

This is a good opportunity for purple pride to show full force. If you don't have class or have to work, then there is no reason you should not be there. We hope Fright Night Five is just the beginning of a productive season.

Moving toward the MIDDLE ROAD

Fringes of abortion issue do not hold answers

AMYCUNNINGHAM

I have moved into the gray area. There isn't any other way to say it. On an issue that once seemed so fundamental, so clear, so black and white, I've become the person whom I find fits just above least admirable. I have become the person, not so much with no opinion, but with an opinion that appeases neither side. I am Ms. Middle of the Road.

If I have to label myself, I am, I suppose, still pro-choice. After all, I don't think that abortion should be completely abolished. I think, like 65 percent of my fellow middle-of-the-road Americans, that abortion in the first trimester is acceptable.

What America needs to solve this divisive issue is compromise. If I am the first person to suggest this, then I might well be the smartest person alive. We need to find a way to make abortion unnecessary. We need to find an end to the need for abortion.

I have yet to hear a reproductive-rights supporter suggest that what this country needs is more abortion. I have never seen an abortion doctor advertise his services on television. The profession, as some would suggest, is not about the business of making money. As a matter of fact, if I were a betting woman and I were going into the doctoring profession to make money, I would guess that plastic surgeons make a heck of a lot more than these gynecologists. And plastic surgeons don't have to worry about their offices being blown up, either.

I have yet to hear anything other than rhetoric from either the pro-life camp or the pro-choice side. And don't even get me started on the crap I hear from politicians. This is what needs to change: Instead of pitting citizens against each other, both sides of this debate need to come together to find a plausible solution.

Pro-lifers pretend to be concerned with women facing such a difficult decision as to end an unwanted pregnancy, both emotionally and physically.

Well, if they were that worried about women facing medical risks, why wouldn't they protest liposuction, where according to a 1994-1998 Pennsylvania State University college of Medicine Study, one in 5,000 people die from the procedure?

Some of these people even advocate the killing of such doctors. Although they don't represent the majority of pro-lifers, they certainly tarnish their image.

Pro-choicers are really no better. Some, in the name of reproductive freedom, advocate a method of abortion wherein a baby who might otherwise be viable outside of the womb is, (and to no avail I searched long and hard for a word that was more "politically correct") essentially, murdered. Of course, this is done in the name of the physical or mental health of the mother, although I can't imagine how the late-term abortion is mentally less taxing than going an extra few weeks and delivering. Finally, I wonder how someone can take so long to come to the conclusion that an abortion is what is needed to end this unwanted pregnancy. The mother couldn't decide within the first couple of months?

At any rate, each side lobs legislative hand grenades, taunting each other when the solution is far from simple, but staring them both in the face.

There are things that we as a people can do to decrease the number of unwanted pregnancies. The first is parenting. We need to talk to our children about sex in a way that is non-threatening and promotes a healthy and respectful view. I know, I know, that probably isn't easy, but if it is easy to talk to parents about sex it surely will be easier to talk to a partner when the time arises.

The second is ... parenting. OK, I am back on the parents. You should monitor the entertainment your child seeks and make sure that they aren't too sheltered from healthy sexual images or exposed to images that they aren't ready for. As Christina Aguilera says, she's only 23, she cannot parent America, and yet the image that she projects is one full of latent sexual messages. Also, if you have done your job as a parent, then I hope the choices your child makes as an adult will be, well, sound decisions.

Education. Education. Education. Now, I understand that people want abstinence taught in health classes in America's public schools, as it should be. But we are naive if we think that kids aren't out there experimenting with sex. Sometimes that experiment fails miserably.

How are people going to make the right choices concerning sex if they haven't been given the proper tools to do so? We should demand that insurance companies pay for birth control. According to the National Abortion and Reproductive Rights Action League Web site, in Kansas there is no law, policy or regulation requiring private health insurance companies to provide coverage for contraception. Some provide for pregnancy termination. Americans should welcome the introduction of certain drugs, such as mifeprestone and the morning after pill into our doctor's offices. These methods are safer, less invasive and allow termination earlier than the current methods for abortion.

We should usher out the era wherein the partial-birth abortion procedure is commonplace. This practice needs to be limited to extreme cases wherein real threats are posed to the health of the mother and it is less a matter of convenience.

The answer isn't going to be simple, and neither side will ever be fully satisfied, however this is what spells out compromise. Move into the middle of the road and make a commitment to solve troubling problems.

Columnist presents wrong image of Nader's candidacy

Editor,

It always saddens me when the Collegian columnists start running out of ideas to write about. It happens sooner for some than others, but Clint Mudrick seems to have hit the wall this week with his column comparing Ralph Nader to Kevin Smith.

I suppose I shouldn't take it so seriously, because it was obviously meant to be funny. Mudrick also made a number of unsupported claims about Nader, however, that didn't seem to be motivated by humorous intent. Maybe it troubles me because Nader has been so thoroughly shut out of the mainstream (corporate) press. Nader supporters like me are eager to see any mention of him in any venue. Even fair-minded, rational criticism would better than being ignored.

Unfortunately, Mudrick fails on both counts.

Nader doesn't "sidestep" foreign policy. He advocates diplomacy instead of military intervention. He recommends the withdrawal of U.S. forces stationed all over the world in favor of letting Europe and Japan defend themselves. He has criticized the government of Israel for its extreme reaction to the Palestinian protest. He calls for the revocation of the World Trade Organization on the grounds that it allows U.S. corporations to exploit the people and resources of third-world countries without regard for anything but profit.

Nor is his campaign "pivoting" on his opposition to the death penalty. That issue is important to him, but so are workers' rights to organize, women's right to safe and legal abortions, strong environmental preservation measures, better consumer protection policies and the need for a political process that is not compromised by corporate bribery in the form of campaign contributions. There are dozens of other domestic issues that Nader speaks about intelligently and passionately.

Every voter should seek out information about his campaign and make their own choices. You won't see it on the evening news, because the corporations that own the major networks don't want us to know about Nader. Apparently, Mudrick doesn't either. I hope next time he is stuck for a topic, he will make a more substantive attempt to inform himself and others — or at least goof on somebody he understands a little better.

Readers encouraged to vote for approval of amendment

Editor,

This Nov. 7, Kansas voters have the chance to make a common-sense change for the common good. Voters will be asked to approve an amendment to the Kansas Constitution to remove an unnecessary restriction on state-authorized retirement fund investments. This may allow the Kansas Public Employees Retirement System to boost its investment returns and reduce fees paid to investment advisers — good news for all Kansans.

Because of current law, the Kansas Public Employees Retirement System cannot invest funds in any financial institution. As many investors know, these institutions are a significant portion of today's stock market. In fact, it costs the system an estimated $1 million each year in management fees for special handling to keep all its investments "bank-free."

That means as tax payers and retirement system members we are paying more for less. With an entire industry excluded from the investment pool, we also lose valuable opportunities, estimated in a single year to be as much as $45 million in lost potential revenue.

Vote "yes" on election day for constitutional amendment No. 1 and take advantage of a great opportunity to remove an outdated restriction on Kansas Public Employees Retirement System investments. Your "yes" vote on the constitutional amendment will result in direct savings of time and money for the retirement fund, along with the potential for improved investment returns.

Revised Activities Fair better for clubs than activity center

Editor,

I was one of possibly two people who actually stopped by the forum on the proposed student activities center this afternoon. Supposedly, the SAC is needed to help struggling clubs gain more members, among other things. The SAC brochure named a few other universities that had such a facility.

They didn't mention any universities that don't have a SAC and yet have a thriving club life. I attended one such university earlier in my college career. The way clubs were allowed to thrive was to have a "Club Week" — an entire week for booths and membership drives — instead of the couple of hours on one evening that clubs are currently allotted. This would be a lot more economical to arrange and more effective at promoting clubs than a big building to hide them in.

It's no wonder some clubs are struggling at K-State. When the whole student population is expected to find out about them during the tiny slot of time clubs have at the beginning of the year, it's not surprising that the membership numbers amount to about the same that attended the SAC forum.

Focus on murderers, rapists distorts voting-rights issue

Editor,

It's hard not to agree with Rick Wooten's position that convicted murderers and rapists should be denied the right to vote. For crimes of a certain degree, the privileges of full citizenship should be revoked — this is reflected in prisoners' incarceration terms and the restrictions placed on these individuals after release.

However, the debate over whether people with felony convictions should vote is not really about murderers and rapists, but rather about the vast majority of prisoners who have been incarcerated in recent years for simple drug possession as a result of our increasingly strict "zero tolerance" approach to law enforcement.

It is a reflection of society's increasing disenchantment with the effectiveness of the "war on drugs" and a growing awareness of the imbalance in sentencing between upper-class white and lower-class black populations for drug-related crimes that is driving the effort to restore voting privileges to those convicted of drug possession.

By discussing only murderers and rapists, Wooten is merely confusing the issues involved.

Delta Chi fraternity announces winner of 5th sorority woman of year award

By JAMIE BARRETT
Kansas State Collegian

Six K-State sorority women had the honor of being finalists for Delta Chi fraternity's Woman of the Year award, but one Pi Beta Phi member took the honor.

Sara Tirrell, senior in pre-medicine and anthropology, was named Sorority Woman of the Year on Saturday evening at the Delta Chi Founder's Day Banquet. Tirrell said receiving the award was an amazing honor for her.

"It was very flattering to be nominated for the award and even more so to win it," Tirrell said. "This brings a great credit to the greek system."

Tirrell was a finalist for the award along with five other women: Mary Schwartz, Delta Delta Delta member who was named runner-up; Katherine Scheer, Delta Delta Delta member; Mollie Jackson, Alpha Xi Delta member; Megan Tibbetts, Chi Omega member and Mary Bosco, Alpha Delta Pi member.

Joseph Cross, junior in construction science and public relations chairman for Delta Chi, said finalists were picked through a selection committee.

"Each sorority house nominated four girls, and then we narrowed it down to the six through a faculty panel," Cross said. "The woman of the year and the runner-up were determined through an interview process."

Cross said this was the fifth year for the award, which was developed to recognize outstanding positive contributions made by sorority women on campus and in the community.

"Every finalist was very much qualified," Cross said. "Sara's interview must have put her over the top with the judges."

Tirrell said being in the company of the other finalists was fun for her because they were all so supportive of one another.

"A lot of us that were finalists are actually very good friends," Tirrell said. "I have a lot of respect for all of the women who were finalists, and it was an honor to be categorized with them."

Tirrell serves as president of her sorority and is active with Blue Key Senior Honorary Society and the Student Alumni Board.

Melissa Divine, instructor of women's studies and a member of the judging panel, said the decision was hard, but what set Tirrell apart was her passion and commitment to everything she does.

"Sara was very poised and self confident," Divine said. "She uses her leadership as an example, and that is to be commemorated."

Divine said one striking thing about Tirrell was her commitment to help people in need.

"Sara recognizes that she is a privileged person and considers herself very blessed, " she said. "It is wonderful when someone can recognize their privileges and use them to help other people. Sara has a keen sensitivity to those in need."

Tirrell said she is going to use the award as a reminder to keep doing positive things for herself and for the people around her.

"I am just going to look to this as a bonus," she said. "I am just going to keep doing what I was already doing and living the way I have always lived."

Microsoft Corp. tracks illegal hacker in system

By GENE JOHNSON
The Associated Press

SEATTLE — Microsoft Corp. said Sunday that a hacker had high-level access to its computer system for 12 days — not up to five weeks, as the company had first reported — and that the company monitored the illegal activity the entire time.

While the company says no significant corporate secrets were stolen, at least one security expert said 12 days would be plenty of time for a hacker to do damage that might not have been detected yet.

Microsoft spokesman Rick Miller said Sunday that beginning Oct. 14 a hacker gained access to high-level secrets and was able to view blueprints, or source code, for Microsoft software being developed.

Originally, the Seattle-based software giant said an electronic intruder had access to source code for as long as five weeks. On Friday, when the company first confirmed the it, the duration was unclear, Miller said.

The company was alerted to the break-in by the creation of new accounts that give users access to parts of Microsoft's computer network.

"We start seeing these new accounts being created, but that could be an anomaly of the system," Miller said. "After a day or two, we realized it was someone hacking into the system."

On Oct. 26, the company notified federal law enforcement, which is investigating. Miller said the company is confident the high-level access occurred only between Oct. 14 and Oct. 25.

"We realized the intrusion had grown to the level that warranted bringing in the FBI," Miller said. Miller said the activity did not corrupt or modify the code for the product, however the hacker could have accessed corporate e-mails and other confidential information.

If any attempts to download or transfer the source code were made, such activity was not recorded in Microsoft's logs, Miller said. He said it was unlikely source code files were copied because of their immense size.

But at least one security expert questioned Miller's assessment.

"It's impossible to say with absolute certainty that (source code) file has not been copied," according to Simon Perry, vice president of security solutions at Computer Associates International in Islandia, N.Y. "Over a 12 day period, it would be absolutely possible to take a copy of that."

Microsoft has refused to identify what program the source code was for, except to say it was a product years from release — not Windows or Office software.

Microsoft's source codes are the most coveted in the multibillion-dollar industry. With access to the software blueprints, competitors could write programs that undermine Microsoft — or use the data to identify vulnerabilities, making computer break-ins and virus-writing easier.

PLAYGROUND

science, said the handicapped-accessible playground will be very beneficial to the community.

"We don't have any play equipment that people with disabilities can use," McGivern said. "Without this, one kid in a family may have had to sit out when the family went to the park. Now families will have a place to take all of their children, all the time."

Park crews spent much of last week assembling posts and digging holes for attachments. On Saturday, Pi Kappa Phi members helped to assemble the structure.

Huff said the manufacturers of the play ramp estimate that approximately 600 man-hours are required to assemble the ramp. About 60 individuals cooperated on Saturday to complete the bulk of the ramp.

The wet weather hindered completion of the play ramp. Huff said the only part that needs finished is the rubberized play surface beneath the ramp. Huff said it can not be laid until the ground is dry.

"It's remarkable how quickly something like this can go together when people coordinate efforts and move quickly," Huff said.

Huff said the commitment and hard work of the fraternity members made the work seem quick and enjoyable.

"The group was most definitely dedicated to doing this. Their spirits were up, and they gave a lot of effort," Huff said. "That says a lot for the fraternity."

Schalekamp said giving something back to the community is important to the fraternity and the Give-A-Push weekends allow members to do that.

"These Give-a-Push weekends allow us to show the community that good things do come out of the greek system," Schalekamp said. "It also allows members to build leadership skills and give something back to the community."

Getting wrecked

26-10 loss to Texas A&M takes K-State out of top 10

By DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

In Saturday's dance with Texas A&M, K-State seemed to have two left feet.

Despite gaining more total offensive yards than the Aggies, the Wildcats were unable to match A&M's scoring output, losing the game 26-10.

The swarming Aggie defense, known as the "Wrecking Crew," showed its typical prowess in College Station, keeping K-State's offense guessing for much of the game's first half, giving up 126 yards and no points.

Senior QB Jonathan Beasley was picked off twice in the first 30 minutes, going just five-for-15 with 61 yards passing. Junior tailback Josh Scobey also ran eight times for just 36 yards in the first half.

Head coach Bill Snyder said he was frustrated and dejected as he made his way to the locker room down 19-0 at halftime, looking for answers to an A&M defense that ended his team's five first-half drives with three punts and two interceptions.

"We'd get a play here and a play there and a first down here, but we just couldn't put anything together," Snyder said. "That was the story of the first half."

A&M, however, found consistency early and often in the first half behind fullback Ja'Mar Toombs, who established season-highs in both rushing yards (89) and touchdowns (three).

Toombs entered the game averaging just 14.3 yards per game, but took advantage of the Wildcats' weak tackling for 59 yards in the first half.

"Toombs is a good back, but we just tackled too high," junior linebacker Ben Leber said. "He was tough — they kept throwing stuff at us that kept us off guard."

Aggie head coach R.C. Slocum was impressed with his team's combined 98 yards rushing in the first half and said Toombs' contribution was impressive.

"Ja'Mar is a good football player," Slocum said. "He makes things happen and gets extra yards on most of his runs. I thought we needed balance on offense and the line did a good job of getting movement and the backs ran hard."

A&M offensive coordinator Steve Kragthorpe said he was also confident in Toombs' ability to produce.

"He told me that he would get the job done, so I saddled him and rode him off into the sunset," Kragthorpe said.

Toombs and the rest of the A&M offense barreled through would-be K-State tacklers until the Wildcat defense came up with some big stops early in the second half.

Defensively, the Wildcats held the Aggies to three-and-outs on each of the Aggies' first four possessions of the second half, holding them scoreless in the third quarter.

However, the Wildcats could only capitalize on those stops for 10 points with a 31-yard touchdown pass from Beasley to Aaron Lockett and a 22-yard Jamie Rheem field goal.

Nevertheless, that momentum was dashed as A&M added a touchdown with 10:21 to play in the fourth quarter following a Wes Bautovich interception, putting the nail in the Wildcats' coffin.

EVAN SEMON/Collegian

Texas A&M quarterback Mark Farris (right), and tight end Fred Spiller (left) celebrate after fullback Ja'Mar Toombs' third touchdown in the fourth quarter.

Following the game, Snyder said the Wildcats must build on past successes in order to do well in the team's remaining games.

"The only way I know to turn the season around is to do better at what you do," he said.

With two losses in the Big 12, K-State must now focus on the team's remaining three games and know that the possibility of a conference championship is still possible, Snyder said.

"We just realize that we still have a chance to do some of the things that we'd like to do."

Texas A&M crowd helps team on field

By DAN SMITH

Twelve men on the field is a penalty in the game of football, but no flags were thrown for illegal participation Saturday when Texas A&M's "Twelfth Man" entered the contest.

A popular tradition for A&M fans, the "Twelfth Man" involves standing during the entire game and cheering for the Aggies.

K-State found out just how influential that extra man was in College Station, playing in front of 80,659 fans, the second-largest crowd ever to see the Wildcats play a football game.

Both K-State and the hometown Aggies felt the impact of the crowd's presence.

A&M center Seth McKinney said that the crowd support was one of the most impressive in Kyle Field history and acknowledged it had a say in the game's outcome.

"Today was the loudest I've ever heard Kyle Field," McKinney said. "I was getting a headache out there, but I loved every minute of it."

Coupled with A&M's "Wrecking Crew" defense, the Kyle Field crowd gave the Wildcats plenty of headaches on Saturday as well, forcing Jonathan Beasley to scramble to the line of scrimmage several times in order to better communicate audibles to the rest of the offense.

As a result, K-State was flagged for nine penalties for 66 yards, but head coach Bill Snyder was reluctant to attribute those penalties to the crowd, citing the team's many mental lapses as the reason for the mistakes.

"I always think that a lack of focus is what causes those," Snyder said. "If the crowd were going to cause false starts, then we would have had one every snap — it's a matter of focus.

"They'd put rules in there if it wasn't going to allow you to play the game. They need to keep their focus where it needs to be and not respond to anything other than where they need to play."

Offensively, the Wildcats seemed to be confused all day, checking off many times during plays to ensure their snap counts and reads were correct, and A&M coach R.C. Slocum seemed to be pleased with his fans' enthusiasm.

"I thought the crowd was fantastic," Slocum said. "It was a beautiful day for college football with a good

Cat defense meets match in Aggie running attack

By SAM STIERS

K-State's run defense had been solid all season, but against Texas A&M, the Cats got run over.

The defense entered the day ranked fifth in the nation in team rushing defense, allowing only 78.9 yards per game.

Saturday, A&M ran the ball 53 times against K-State for 171 yards, and although the Aggies only averaged 3.2 yards per carry, fullback Ja'Mar Toombs relentless pounding up the middle took its toll on the defense, senior defensive end Monty Beisel said.

"He's a great running back. He's a big guy, and he's a kind of back we haven't seen all season. He ran over us

Streak snapped

Texas A&M's 26-10 victory snapped K-State's streak of 60 consecutive wins against unranked opponents in the regular season. The Wildcats' last defeat was a 27-23 loss at Iowa State on Nov. 6, 1993.

Lone Star loss

The Aggies victory over K-State marks the Cats' first loss to a Big 12 team from the state of Texas since the league's inception in 1996. The defeat also snaps K-State's streak of six consecutive wins in games played within the borders of the state.

Full stadium

Saturday's attendance of 80,659 is the second-largest crowd ever to witness a K-State football game, with the largest (83,082) at Texas on Oct. 2, 1999. The crowd was the third biggest turnout at Kyle Field in the stadium's history.

30-minute drought

K-State's offense was shut out in the first half for the first time since Nov. 16, 1996, when Colorado led 12-0 after the first two quarters of play. The shut out snapped a streak of 47 consecutive games the Cats scored in the opening half. In 2000, K-State has scored in all but six quarters played, three coming against the Aggies this weekend.

Long drive

A&M's 97-yard scoring drive late in the second quarter was the longest in terms of yardage given up by the Cat defense this season. The previous long was an 80-yard drive, surrendered on six occasions by four different opponents.

Third-quarter stance

After trailing 19-0 at the half, K-State's defense held the Aggies without a first down in the third quarter.

Beasley moving up

Senior QB Jonathan Beasley's 258 yards (227 pass, 31 rush) moved him past Darrell Ray Dickey into fifth place on K-State's career total offense charts. Beasley also jumped into a tie for sixth in career passing with 3,963 yards.

Home-field advantage

Texas A&M's victory over the Cats is its sixth straight over a ranked opponent at Kyle Field, including its third consecutive over a top-10 team.

TD Toombs

A&M junior fullback Ja'Mar Toombs tied a career-high with three touchdowns against the Wildcats. The last time the K-State defense allowed three or more rushing TDs by an individual was Oct. 4, 1997, when Nebraska's Ahman Green found the end zone four times.

Bowl crazy

In attendance for the Texas A&M/K-State game this weekend were bowl representatives from the Tostitos Fiesta Bowl, SBC Cotton Bowl Classic, Culligan Holiday Bowl, Sylvania Alamo Bowl, Insight.com Bowl and the Samford Independence Bowl.

Sequel does not live up to original

Review by CORBIN H. CRABLE

movie review

"Blair Witch 2: Book of Shadows"

Showing: Seth Childs Cinema at 4:30, 7:30 and 9:40 p.m.

Take, for instance, "The Blair Witch Project," one of the biggest box office hits of summer 1999. This ground-breaking movie made do with a meager budget, using the power of suggestion as its scare tactic. And it worked.

And then there's the sequel, "Blair Witch 2: Book of Shadows" from Artisan Entertainment. Did I mention that there's no book of shadows present in this movie? What a great start: even the title of the movie makes you feel cheated.

When five college students go into the woods in search of more information on the Blair Witch legend, they soon fall victim to a number of strange occurrences (big surprise), which eventually leads to the death (or murder ... mwahaha!) of one of the thrill-seekers. As the others struggle to find the cause of death, the spirit of the Blair Witch seems to "enter" their minds, causing paranoia attacks and violent behavior.

To begin with, the cliched characters are played by virtually unknown actors. We have a former mental patient (still haunted by his past), a Wiccan (i.e. a child of nature), a goth girl and two seemingly normal people who look out of place amongst their witch-hunting peers.

Let's face it: you can't top the original "Blair Witch."

There was the hype on the Internet last summer as to whether the legend of the Blair Witch was true, and some people even believed the events were real after seeing the movie. Did this make the movie more frightening? Of course.

Also, as an assistant manager at a movie theater, I experienced firsthand the effects such a movie had on its audiences, such as motion sickness. The proof was there in their seats after the movie, in the form of a puddle. I think I'll leave it at that.

The sequel is nothing more than another scary movie. There are few "shaky camera" scenes, and you can forget about the power of suggestion to induce fear: the blood and gore are there, in vague flash-forward sequences that have little to do with the movie's events.

This is a definite bastardization of the original and definitely not as scary. It most likely will be forgotten soon.

If you want to experience real fear, just go out, rent or buy the original "Blair Witch," cuddle up with someone, turn off the lights and let your imagination do all the work.

Staff members offer scariest movie picks

Halloween isn't just about putting on a costume and getting some candy. Part of the thrill of the holiday is that intense feeling of fear brought on by horror movies that become especially popular this time of year.

So once the costume parties and trick or treating are over and you are looking for the perfect horror movie to make your Halloween complete, check out some of the Collegian staff's favorites for a good scare.

"Silence of the Lambs"

I've never been affected by the usual brand of horror film.

While the long list of movies featuring blood suckers, curse casters and Jennifer Love Hewitt are good for a quick scare, I prefer the type of movies that frighten me because their plots could be taken from modern-day headlines.

In a world full of people like Jeffrey Dahmer and the Manson family, horror films with mortal foes work best.

That's why "Silence of the Lambs" will give me nightmares for the rest of my life.

The story centers on Clarice Starling, a novice FBI agent forced to take the advice of one serial killer in order to capture another. Buffalo Bill, the psycho Clarice hunts, traps women in an abandoned well in order to sew their skin together and make a sort of transsexual suit.

Hannibal Lecter, Clarice's cannibalistic confidant, does his best to guide the agent on her search, but his tendency to drive people insane before dining on their major organs makes Clarice wary of Lecter's tutelage.

Maybe what makes "Silence" so frightening is the actor who became the gruesome genius: Anthony Hopkins.

This movie was saved from cheezy-horror infamy by the man behind the mask, who made this character the most bone-chilling ever written. Lecter's dead eyes and even voice make him the scariest kind of boogey man — the kind you could meet in a dark alley on your way home each night.

Count me in when its sequel, "Hannibal," hits theaters next year. Lecter on the loose should make for a good flick.

—Jenn Davoren

"The Shining"

Thinking of my favorite scary movie is hard — I love them all. I am a huge fan of scary movies, but one that I have seen many, many times and never fails to scare me is "The Shining."

It is an obvious classic for famous one-liners such as, "Here's Johnny!" and "Redrum." "The Shining" is everything that a scary movie should be. Nearly every aspect of the movie is terrifying in one way or another.

From young Danny being tormented by the ghosts of the Overlook Hotel, Jack going crazy as he tries to complete a novel and the ever-present eeriness of Shelly Duvall, "The Shining" sends chills down my spine every time.

I vote for "The Shining" because it is a classic, because every time I see it there is a new element to intrigue and terrify me.

Time and time again I will sit through this film, grasp the arm of my chair when the blood gushes from the elevator, scream as Jack chops his way into the bathroom with an ax and stare in horror as Duvall reacts to pages and pages of "All work and no play makes Jack a dull boy."

I do love scary movies, and I love "The Shining."

—Jamie Barrett

"The Exorcist"

A few weeks ago, in a review, I voiced my opinion that "The Exorcist" is the scariest movie ever made. I doubt my mind will be changed anytime soon.

I've always been a fan of this movie, which is a leader in horror films. In fact, during the first weekend of its re-release, I saw it three times.

What makes "The Exorcist" so scary is the fact that it's based on real reports of an exorcism performed on a young boy in 1949. "The Exorcist" is a classic battle between good and evil, of faith vs. wicked unseen forces.

The juxtaposition of the epitomes of evil (i.e. Satan) and innocence (i.e. a young girl, Regan, played by Linda Blair) is fascinating.

The shocking visual scenes (such as the newly added spiderwalk sequence and the director's apparent penchant for pea green soup) and eerie demonic noises (such as those that emit from Regan's room) combine to make a truly frightening film ... and one that I plan on watching time and again.

—Corbin H. Crable

"The Blair Witch Project"

It is embarrassing to admit what my favorite scary movie is. In fact, it is rather an odd pick, since I have only seen it once.

But "The Blair Witch Project" had a considerable effect on me at the time.

When I went to see it in the movie theater, the rumors had circulated that it was non-fiction, so I thought the footage about the three lost teenagers was true. (I know I wasn't the only one who fell for the hoax.)

Nonetheless, the movie was original and relatively fast paced, sometimes to the point of making me dizzy. It wasn't predictable, and it was something fresh.

If you want to watch a movie that will make your skin crawl, watch it with the mind set that it is a true story — just be prepared for some goosebumps.

—Erin Schneweis

"Halloween"

As far as I'm concerned, this has got to be one of the best horror movies — ever.

Now, granted, the acting is far from superb and some of the lines are borderline cheesy, but all things considered, this is one scary movie.

Fifteen years after Michael Myers murders his sister, he escapes from a sanitarium to return to his hometown of Haddonfield, Ill., and proceeds to track down 17-year-old Laurie Strode, killing anybody in his way.

The reason "Halloween" is a great scary movie is because there is something that evokes extreme fear from the thought of being chased, especially when the chaser never has to run and is always just one step behind.

The faceless Myers just seems to glide from place to place as he hunts down the frantic Strode who is running for her life.

The recurring, repetitive three-note theme in the background adds a sense of intense urgency and helps strike fear into the heart of viewers.

And most importantly, what makes this movie great is Jamie Lee Curtis.

Curtis, an unknown before "Halloween," emerges as a true scream queen, playing a very convincing scared-helpless victim turned victor.

all day, and we had a hard time tackling him," he said. "I don't know what you credit that to, but it's tough when you see him gaining yards and you see guys lying around on the turf."

Toombs entered the game with 50 carries for 100 yards. However, against the Cats, the 6-foot, 275-pound junior set season-highs in yards and carries, finishing the day with 89 yards on 24 attempts, while tying a career-high with three touchdown runs.

Linebacker Ben Leber credited Toombs with having a good day but said the defense also lacked focus.

"Toombs is a big back. I don't want to take anything away from him — he's big' he's physical," Leber said. "But, we tackled too high. When you get a big guy like that, you have to cut his legs out."

The Cats have had tackling problems throughout the season, missing 17 against Oklahoma alone. Head coach Bill Snyder said the team made some progress in last week's game but lacked technique in the loss to A&M.

"The (tackling) wasn't nearly as good as it was last week," Snyder said. "Toombs makes you miss some tackles, but we were not prepared to tackle low like you have to on a running back like that. We certainly did do a lot of bouncing off him."

Yet, the defense did made good adjustments during halftime, Snyder said, as they dominated the line of scrimmage early in the second half, forcing A&M into three consecutive three-and-outs to start the third quarter.

"I don't think he was wearing us out, I think we were wearing ourselves out. We were on the field, I don't know, 200 plays today. When you're on the field that long, it's tough to make plays all day."

– Monty Beisel

However, A&M would stick with the run and continued to pound Toombs between the tackles. After the Aggies picked off their second pass of the day, head coach R.C. Slocum's squad was able to drive 29 yards against a tired Cat defense.

"I think I was a little worn down because I thought we were on the field the whole time," Leber said.

"It wasn't because of any personnel or anything like that. I think we took a lot of reps at the beginning, and it was a little warm out there, but I honestly thought we took it pretty well and everyone was well conditioned."

Beisel said Toombs wasn't the sole reason the defense wore down, as he said agreed with Leber that the length of time they were on the field was a big factor.

"I don't think he was wearing us out, I think we were wearing ourselves out," Beisel said Saturday. "We were on the field, I don't know, 200 plays today. When you're on the field that long, it's tough to make plays all day."

Although 200 might be a little far-fetched, the defense was in fact on the field for 73 plays, as A&M dominated the time of possession, controlling the ball for 36:18.

The Cats will face another physical back next week in Iowa State's Ennis Haywood. Leber said the defense has been in this situation before and bounced back.

"We'll look at the film and see exactly what was going on," he said.

"I don't know if we just weren't wrapping up or what. But, we corrected the problem against Texas Tech and I think the way we did that was just focus and wrap up on every play. So, I think we'll have more of a concerted effort in practice."

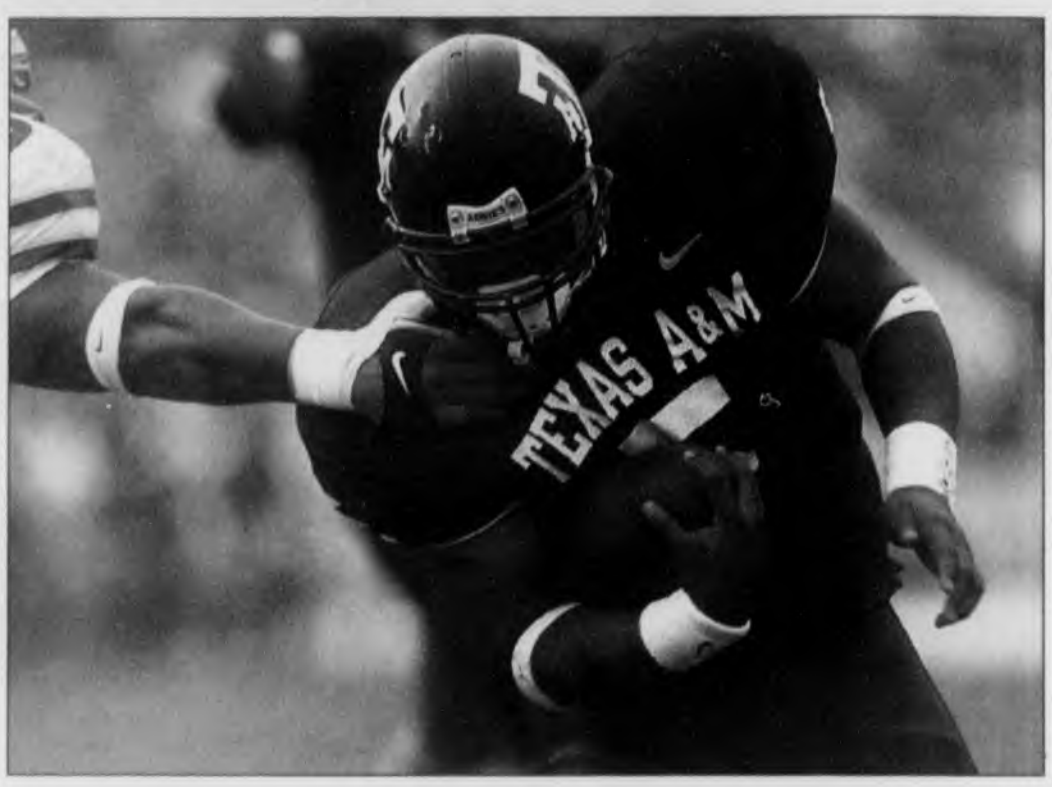
opponent, and the crowd really responded."



Another consequence of Kyle Field's noise was the Wildcats' failure to convert in crucial third-down situations. K-State finished just 4-for-14 on third downs for the game.

A&M offensive coordinator Steve Kragthorpe said the crowd helped to keep the Wildcat offense out of sync throughout the game, especially on those third down situations when it counted the most.

"The crowd was great today and did a good job of interrupting their timing," Kragthorpe said. "They also got us some delay of game penalties."

contests will get to participate in the Fright Night activities tonight.

Blackert said he thought the campout was awesome and planned to enter the slam dunk contest.

"I don't believe there's this many people out here," he said. "There's a lot of people out here."

Those who camped out were guaranteed priority for getting tickets Monday morning.

"Both men's and women's basketball teams have been very involved in getting this in order," Laura Tietjen, associate athletic director, said.

She said the teams were excited about the night and about getting the student body involved.

"We have really dynamic coaching staffs here, and they really want to put good teams on the floor," Tietjen said.

Having student involvement and support plays a big role in their successes, she said.

"They both want the student body to embrace these two teams as their teams," Tietjen said.

She said they planned to gear some contests and give-a-ways toward college students at games this year to help get that involvement.

"The goal is to make it a good atmosphere," Tietjen said.

Head basketball coach Jim Wooldridge said he had never been involved in an event like the ticket campout.

"I think it's a lot of fun," he said. "It's a nice way to begin the basketball season."

Wooldridge said he appreciated all the people who were there.

"It's fun to see college kids get involved with your program," he said. "I think it shows there's a real interest level in college basketball on our campus, and it's fun to be around."

Wooldridge said the campout was a good way to show to both the players and students that they'd like to be involved with each other.

Such an event, he said, might help motivate the team — having them see how important their team and their sport is to some students.

"What we try to do, is get the kids coming to our games," Wooldridge said. "They create the enthusiasm, the atmosphere we want at our games. This is a great way to intermingle with them, and let them know we want them to be a part of us."

ones that cry. We're trying not to scare so many kids this year, though."

To create the scary setting, Meredith said she hides candy at the back of the store and forces the trick-or-treaters to weave their way through the shelves. Their way, of course, is impeded with employees dressed in scary costumes. The Bookstore also has a new feature every year, Meredith said.

"We have a new trick every year, but I'm not going to tell what it is," she said. "You'll just have to wait and see."

Aggieville won't be the only place for children to have fun on Halloween. Manhattan Town Center and Wildcat Creek both also organize events.

Manhattan Town Center's Boo Party, for instance, has store-to-store trick-or-treating from 6 to 8 p.m. on Tuesday and a haunted house is set up for the older kids in the mall tonight and Tuesday night. Cost for the haunted house is $6 for adults and $3 for children under 10 years of age.

At Wildcat Creek, Trick-or-Treat Lane will be set up from 6 to 9 tonight and Tuesday night. The lane will have 12 stations with cartoon characters handing out candy. At the end of the lane will be a tent with free Domino's pizza and Pepsi.

Wildcat Creek also will provide free miniature golf and video games. A costume contest will held both nights at 8 p.m. Admission is $3 for adults and children, and proceeds go to the Boys and Girls Club of Manhattan.

FRIGHT NIGHT

women's roster has six new players and two red-shirt players.

Senior guard Kim Woodlee said the newly formed team is looking to take K-State to the next level, one its supporters deserve.

"The fans being there always, through thick and through thin — you can't understand how much that means," Woodlee said. "We haven't always had 20-win seasons, but we have been in the top 20 in attendance."

On the men's side, Wooldridge has brought a new style to the court. Forward Travis Reynolds said the Cats are striving to learn it, and the program is excited to unveil it.

"I think its great for fans to come out and see how the team has progressed," Reynolds said. "He's teaching us everything from the ground up, so everything is kind of new."

Tonight's program will feature performances from the cheerleaders and Classy Cats. A women's three-point contest is scheduled along with a slam dunk contest and play from the two teams.

"It is very similar to years past, but we just want to put more of an emphasis on basketball," Mores said. "We want people to go away with a good feeling about the programs."

Sophomore Donnie Wallace said Fright Night should be another step in an exciting year.

"It's exciting. I mean, nobody knows quite what to expect, but if things are correlated by how hard you work, then we should be a lot better this year," he said.

County voter registration up, favors GOP

By LYNNE HERMANSEN

ELECTIONS 2000

Riley County has 31,883 registered voters for the Nov. 7 general election, according to the county clerk's office.

Republican voters outnumber Democrats with 14,522 registered voters, compared to 7,417. There are 9,797 unaffiliated voters.

Jolene Campbell, deputy county clerk, said Republican voter registration is usually is high.

"Typically, it's the way it's always been — that Riley County is a Republican county," she said.

The number of registered voters for this year has gone up since 1996. The total at that time was 27,297 people.

Campbell said there are many reasons for the numbers going up in the past four years.

"We always have drives at K-State to encourage student voting for national elections," she said. "We are also in the process of getting the files cleaned up."

Campbell said files need to be cleaned because people who have moved away still are registered with Riley County.

"Many students have graduated and moved on, and there are continually students moving into Manhattan," Campbell said.

Many Republican students said they feel secure in their political affiliation.

"I'm not worried about Kansas not going Republican since they are known for being Republican," said Justin Williams, freshman in engineering.

Republican students also said they feel their votes count more then other political affiliations.

"I'm happy to be a Republican," said Grant Cochenour, sophomore in electrical engineering. "Kansas usually has Republican officials in their offices, so I feel that my vote would count more."

Cochenour said he thinks if he was a Democrat his vote would mean less.

"I would think a Democrat vote is worthless. Republican candidates have a better chance to win in a Republican area," he said.

Cochenour also said he would feel uneasy living in a Democratic area.

"I would feel outnumbered, but I would still vote, even if I felt a Republican vote in a Democrat environment would be worthless," he said. "It's my civic duty and responsibility to vote. If my candidate loses, I will have the right to complain."

Matt Peak, freshman in music education said he has not registered to vote because o forgetfulness.

"If I were to vote, I would vote Democrat even though it bothers me that I think living in a Republican area works against me," he said.

Wife of former governor to continue campaign

By SCOTT CHARTON
The Associated Press

ROLLA, Mo. — Declaring that "we worked as partners" during almost a half century of marriage, Jean Carnahan said Monday she would accept appointment as a U.S. senator if her late husband out-polls Republican Sen. John Ashcroft on Nov. 7.

Carnahan, 66, is a grandmother of two who never sought nor had public office. But two weeks after a small plane crash that killed two-term Democratic Gov. Mel Carnahan, the couple's eldest son, Roger, and campaign aide Chris Sifford, the widow declared herself strong enough to stand in for her late husband.

"This campaign has never been about one person," Carnahan said as close family members stood by and 15 television cameras captured her words.

Carnahan's announcement added another unprecedented twist to an election thrown into turmoil. The race had been among the nation's most bitterly fought and intensely watched, and independent polls had the two men locked for months in a statistical tie.

But even that was changing.

Media polls taken after Mel Carnahan's burial showed the Senate race still even.

A Zogby International poll conducted for the St. Louis Post-Dispatch and St. Louis television station KMOV had Mel Carnahan with 47.2-percent support against 45.4-percent backing for Ashcroft, a result within the poll's margin of error of plus or minus 4 percentage points.

But Mel Carnahan's lead grew, 49.4 percent to 44.3 percent, after participants in the Zogby poll learned Carnahan had been asked to serve.

The poll was conducted Friday, Saturday and Sunday.

Mel Carnahan's name remains on the ballot because he died after a state deadline for removing it.

Ashcroft, in Columbia on Monday to discuss Social Security and Medicare with senior citizens, sounded a congenial tone toward Carnahan.

"Mrs. Carnahan has always been kind to me. She's written and said things that are very kind about me," Ashcroft said. "She's talked about my ambitious efforts in education. She has been an individual who praised my efforts on welfare reform in Washington."

Some wondered whether Ashcroft could overcome the political awkwardness created by Monday's announcement.

Political scientist Rick Hardy, of the University of Missouri at Columbia, said Ashcroft was in a political straitjacket.

"Ashcroft is really facing three opponents in this race," Hardy said. "One is the legacy of Mel Carnahan. The other is the widow, Jean Carnahan. And the third is the media, which has brought this issue so much attention."

Asked if she would campaign, Carnahan

Physics faculty, students prove existence of subatomic particle

By SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
Kansas State Collegian

It is too tiny to be seen with the most sensitive microscopes, and its mass is too small to even be weighed.

For researchers with the K-State Department of Physics, catching a glimpse of the tau neutrino is a big look at the most basic pieces of the universe.

"We're sort of like Columbus venturing into the world of the ultra-small," said Bill Reay, distinguished professor in the department.

Last summer an international collaboration of physicists, including six K-State faculty and students, finally caught the elusive tau neutrino in the act.

Tau neutrinos, particles smaller than individual atoms, fly through the universe unnoticed with no charge and almost no mass.

"There are billions of neutrinos going through you every second, but it's not a problem because they don't do anything," said Reay, also a collaborator on the experiment.

The existence of neutrinos has been theorized since the 1930s to explain a mysterious loss of energy in radioactive substances. In 1962, a group of scientists won the Nobel Prize for proving the existence of the electron and muon neutrinos. Physicists' data through the 1970s and the 1980s said only three kinds of neutrinos could exist, but the third one still had not been directly observed.

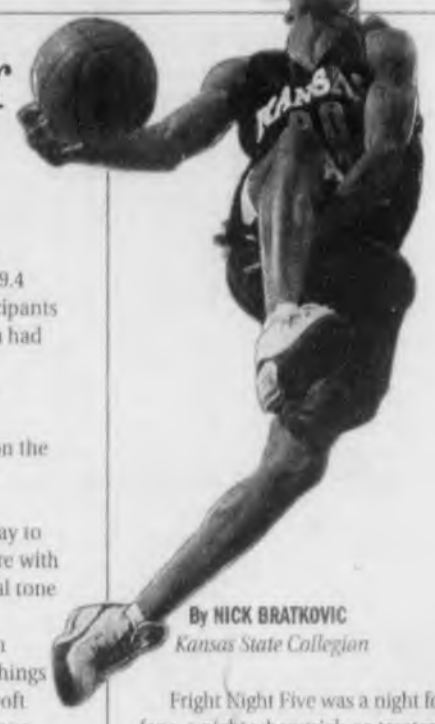
But enter Direct Observation of the Nu Tau or DONUT, a group of physicists from the United States, Japan, Korea and Greece that shared that idea.

"Everybody just knew this particle had to be there," Noel Stanton, physics professor, said.

Doctoral candidate Patrick Berghaus said the proposal was made in 1995 for an experiment to prove what they had suspected for years. In 1997, the Department of Energy's Fermi National Accelerator Laboratory used a particle accelerator to fire an intense neutrino beam into an emulsion plate. In theory, the tau neutrinos would slip into the plate, hit a nucleus, develop a charge and leave the material, Berghaus said. Like photographic film that is sensitive to light, the emulsion would show the path of a charged particle.

"It actually wasn't a surprise at all," Berghaus said. "Still, it was a challenge. It proved harder than we expected."

Three years were required to analyze the results on the plates, he said. Berghaus analyzed reactions with the other types of neutrinos to get an idea of how many reactions would be taus. Magnets and 40 yards of concrete were used to filter out other particles. The plates could not be too close or too far.



Even then, 1,000 potential reactions on the plate narrowed to four confirmed tau particles announced in August, Berghaus said.

Stanton said four reactions are enough to publish the experiment, but teams in Japan will continue to analyze the plates. If more reactions are found, Stanton said results might be republished.

"I think everybody would be a lot happier if we could find a few more events in the same sample," he said.

All three men said they agreed that the discovery was largely for scientific curiosity and will not change the world overnight. However, Reay said, confirming the existence of the third, and perhaps final, kind of neutrino does sharpen physics' picture of the world. It won't mean the end of high-energy physics, but it could identify all the pieces, he said.

"It may be the period at the end of the sentence," he said.

Basketball teams display talents, greet public at Bramlage Coliseum

By NICK BRATKOVIC

Fright Night Five was a night for the fans, a night when trick-or-treaters of all ages received candy and K-State's two basketball programs gave something back to the fans upon the dawn of a new season.

For the K-State men's basketball team, it was the dawn of a new era, as head coach Jim Wooldridge walked his team through drills and made a promise to the fans.

"My promise to you is this, we are going to play real hard, we are going to win some games, and play with a sense of pride," Wooldridge said to the crowd. "If we do that and you do what you do, I think we are going to build ourselves a great winner here."

Emily Forsse, sophomore in mass communications, said she is already optimistic about the program.

"I am so excited about the season, we have a new coach and there is far more excitement this year," Forsse said.

To build on that excitement, the program has made renovations to Bramlage Coliseum. The runway has been renovated, and a new court has been added along with a scoreboard.

The two basketball programs used the scoreboard to showcase their history. The men's video showcased clips of top players such as Ernie Barrett and then profiled this year's squad to the Creed song "Higher."

Fright Night also featured a slam dunk contest that featured Kelvin Howell and Travis Reynolds in a dunk-off that Reynolds eventually won.

The K-State women's basketball team held a contest of its own. K-State guards Kristin Rethman and Kim Woodlee squared off in a three-point shooting competition with winners from last night's basketball camp-out.

Woodlee and Rethman are the returning players on a roster filled with new faces. While the program is undergoing a bit of transition, head coach Deb Patterson introduced six new players to the roster.

"I want to thank you all for being here, we have been in the top 20 in attendance each of the last four years," she said. "Give it up for the K-State fans. I think we have the best fans in the land, and I can't wait for you to see this year's team."

The event eliminated the skits from past years, but instead featured the women scrimmaging and the men running drills featuring members of the crowd.

While basketball played center stage at the event, Fright Night also gave children a head start on trick-or-treating.

The trick-or-treaters walked through booths and received candy from K-State student organizations. One such booth was the Pi Beta Phi sorority, which set up a booth reminiscent of the game Candyland, and gave out candy throughout the different stages of the booth.

"It is fun to see them out here, and see all of the little boys and girls dressed up," Lindsey Allen, junior in marketing, said.

One parent, Chris Houcking, Junction City resident, whose son Cody attended the event as a NASCAR driver, said the night was a safe way to trick-or-treat.

"It is a good safe activity, with a lot of good organizations," she said.

Trick-or-treating aside, K-State fans left Fright Night Five with a new belief in the basketball program Mel Kepple, Manhatta resident, said.

"I am real enthused and encouraged with coach Wooldridge," Kepple said. "I had met him before and he seems real personable."

Students to trick-or-treat for Flint Hills Breadbasket

While other college students will be dressing up and going out to celebrate Halloween, Emily Belton and Sara Tirrell's Introduction to Leadership Concepts group will be dressing up and going out to serve the community.

About 20 K-State students in costume will go door to door from 5 to 7 tonight and ask for canned or other nonperishable food donations.

This group will stop by houses on Himes Road, Winne Drive, Hobbs Drive and Vaughn Drive. They also will visit Woodway, Chase Manhattan and University Commons apartments.

All donations will be taken to the Flint Hills Breadbasket.

Doorz cover band to play in Aggieville for holiday

Members of area bands will come together as a Doors cover band for a special Halloween performance tonight at Silverado Saloon.

The Doorz Resurrection performed this weekend in Lawrence and will make its second and final appearance at 10 tonight.

Jeff Bilberry, KSDB-FM 91.9 production director, said the band will put on a theatrical show and dress as the actual band.

"They're not just singing their songs. They will actually relive what it was like to be at one of their concerts back in the day," Bilberry said.

A cover charge of $5 will be required for admittance to the show, and those attending may enter a Halloween costume contest to win $100.

"We're really stressing costumes," he said. "When everyone's in costume, they'll let loose and have a great time."

The band, which includes well-known Lawrence, Topeka and Kansas City musicians, has a set list of 100 songs to choose from for tonight's performance, Bilberry said.

Steve Danner, who is helping manage the band, said the group has no desire to remain a Doors cover band.

"It's just an elaborate, one-time Halloween occasion," Danner said.

He said people have always told some members of The Doorz Resurrection that they resembled members of the original band.

"Something like this was destined to happen," he said.

With the large capacity of Silverado's, Danner said he has high expectation for the show.

"I think a large part of Manhattan will be there, and they won't regret taking advantage of this one-time opportunity," he said.

Los Angeles police shoot man at Halloween party

LOS ANGELES — The police shooting of a Halloween party guest who had a fake gun has left the troubled Los Angeles Police Department in an unwanted spotlight and the victim's friends blaming racial profiling.

Actor Anthony Dwain Lee, 39, died at a Hollywood Hills mansion after he was shot several times by an officer who fired at him through a glass door about 1 a.m. Saturday.

Police say Lee had pointed what looked like a gun at Officer Tarriel Hopper, and Hopper, who had arrived at the mansion in response to a neighbor's noise complaint, fired in self defense.

"He had no way of knowing it was fake even though people were in costume," Los Angeles Police Department spokeswoman Charlotte Broughton said of the officer Sunday. "If you feel your life is threatened, you react in the way you were trained."

But Lee's friends said Sunday that the shooting was more than a mistake. Some planned to keep vigil Monday night in front of the police station where Hopper is stationed to protest the shooting.

It wasn't clear if Lee knew that Hopper, who also is black, was a policeman and not just another party guest in costume. Some at the party said other guests were wearing LAPD uniforms.

"This is so incredibly shocking that a person would be taken down like this," said Kirsten Blackburn, a friend of Lee's.

The police department and District Attorney's office are both investigating the shooting.

Police said several hundred people were at the mansion early Saturday when Hopper and his partner arrived and began searching for the owner to discuss the noise complaint. It wasn't clear Sunday who owned the mansion.

Lee was an actor who had appeared in supporting TV and film roles, including on the programs "ER" and "NYPD Blue," and as the character Fred in the 1997 Jim Carrey comedy, "Liar Liar." Friends said he embraced Buddhism and spent his free time working with a youth organization.

UPC sponsors carnival for local children

By LYNNE HERMANSEN
Kansas State Collegian

Children in intricately-made costumes of super heroes, monsters and princesses and armed with plastic pumpkin buckets gathered together for an evening of fun Monday.

The Union Program Council sponsored its annual Children's Carnival from 4:30 to 7:30 p.m. in the K-State Student Union.

Christy Welsh, Promotions Committee chairwoman for UPC, said the organization has a good turnout for the event every year.

Students operating and participating in the event did so to gain volunteer hours for an Intro to Leadership class.

These student participants said they like seeing the excitement in the children's faces.

"It's great to see all the children dressed up, having a great time and enjoying all the goodies," John Christy, junior in financial services, said.

Christy said the event is something different that K-State does for the community.

"All types of people get involved, and it's great watching the students and children having a blast in a fun atmosphere," he said.

Manhattan resident Alice Smith said the children received fliers from their schools.

"It's our first time here. I'm expecting it to be a good time," she said.

Denise McNabb, senior in marketing, passes out candy at one of the displays to Christopher Martin, 3, of Manhattan, at the annual Children's Carnival in the K-State Student Union.

Donald Smith, 5, dressed in a X-Men Wolverine costume, jumped right in to the carnival activities.

"Fun," he said. "Lots of candy, lots of games, and look at the cookies."

Some of the students decided to get more involved in the carnival by dressing in costume along with the children.

Nikki Poulin, freshman in pre-veterinary science, dressed in a blue gown with attachable fairy wings and halo, said she had not gotten the opportunity to dress up in years.

"Dressing up is fun, and being here at the carnival gives me a chance to be a kid again," she said. "I think I would do this again next year."

Other dressed up students felt participating in costume made the carnival more entertaining for the children.

"Dressing up is not only fun, but also makes you feel like you are a part of them, "Jennifer Bakumenko, freshman in business administration, said.

Bakumenko said that after an hour of activities, the carnival fun began to catch on.

"There are a lot of people, and children are enjoying everything and soaking up all the fun," she said.

Bakumenko, who is participating for a class, said she would try to volunteer again next year for her own enjoyment.

"I will call UPC and talk to them," she said. "Hopefully I can participate, because so far it's been a lot of excitement, chaos and fun."

Some children said they enjoyed the sport-related activities the most out of all the carnival games.

Brooke Dockins, 8, in blue princess attire, has come to the carnival every year.

"I just like the sports the best," she said. "The basketball game is the best, and soccer too. I like all the sport games."

Eli Redecker, 5, stood out among his peers in a bright green cardboard cactus outfit twice his size.

"I saw a cactus in the store and liked it," he said. "So I'm a cactus."

Redecker joined in the beanbag clown toss game and won a hacky sack.

"I'm having fun, lots of fun, and I won a toy," he said.

"Dressing up is not only fun, but also makes you feel like you are a part of them"

Confidential name reporting helps people infected with HIV

By LYNNE HERMANSEN
Kansas State Collegian

Kansas' first full-year HIV report, released by the Department of Health and Environment, now includes the names of each case.

Sharon Watson, public information officer for the Kansas Department of Health, said confidential name reporting has proven successful.

"It helps to find out which cases are new, and which have been previously reported," she said. "It also helps knowing names, so we can give assistance and funding to people who ask for it."

A state law enacted in 1999 provided a way for HIV cases to be confidentially reported to the department.

The report shows 201 cases of HIV infection were sent to KDHE from July 1, 1999, through June 30, 2000, but only 99 of those cases were diagnosed. The other cases had been previously diagnosed.

"Name reporting helps us determine which cases are new out of all the cases sent in to us," Watson said.

Watson said there is a possibility of cases the department has not been notified about.

"We would like to think the reports are mostly accurate," she said. "It's the responsibility of the physicians to make the reports."

Information to compare Kansas' HIV report to other states was unavailable. Information about specific counties and cities cannot be released due to confidentiality laws, Watson said.

"The confidentially laws are in place to protect those who have reported HIV," Watson said. "There might only be one person in the county, which can make it easy to locate them. This is why we don't break the report down to cities, etc."

Watson said name reporting benefits the person, because they can receive additional services.

"If these people ask for our help, we are able to give them counseling services and medicine-funding referrals," she said.

Eunice Dorst, executive director of the Regional AIDS Project, said there could be dangers to name reporting.

"People are concerned about their names getting out, even though I'm unaware of this happening as of yet," Dorst said.

Dorst said she is worried whether the population at risk will feel free to report their cases.

"I think if we wait another year, we can see the effectiveness of name reporting," she said.

Dorst said there also is an advantage to name reporting.

"I'm torn on the subject, but it affects funding, which makes name reporting very important so those people can receive the needed care," she said. "Other states have used a number system, where they number the cases, and this has proven unsuccessful."

Disease intervention specialists are employees who help with the HIV cases.

"Out of the 103 cases talked to, we were able to find 11 people who were previously undiagnosed," Watson said.

Through interviews, communication agencies and the specialists, the people who came in to contact with the reported cases are able to be reached.

AIDS and HIV medications are expensive, and federal funding is able to help assist those in financial need.

"This is another reason name reporting is instrumental, so the people in need can receive the medical help," Watson said.

The report states that most individuals with newly identified HIV infections live in the state's metropolitan areas. The number of tests performed has not declined with the instituting of name reporting.

Watson said HIV reporting is more vital then AIDS reporting.

"We are able to keep track of HIV annually, whereas with AIDS, HIV could have been contracted up to 10 years prior," she said. "This is highly beneficial to the people who contract the disease."

Editorial board makes choices for costumes

Reed Dunn, editor in chief — Jake Worcester. He gets all the chicks.

Tanner Ehmke, managing editor — Dana Pracht.

Jenn Davoren, news editor — Goth princess with extra-black mascara. This will match my already-pasty complexion.

Erin Schneweis, opinion editor — The opinion editor has finally narrowed it down to three choices. The first is an angel. The second is a waitress from a popular "family restaurant" that has the mascot of an owl. The third? Superman.

Jamie Barrett, campus editor — Yellow duckie.

Sarah Bahari, city/gov editor — Maybe a witch or a princess. That's all I've ever been.

Kristen Dymacek, arts & entertainment editor — A pregnant nun.

Derek Boss, sports editor — Sources say girls will go for the Easter Bunny this year.

Becky Wilson, copy chief — To match her always-charming disposition, the copy chief can be found arrayed as a hedgehog named Spunky. Snurfle. The spines serve both as a fashion accessory and a protection device, making the hedgehog an efficient costume choice.

Sara Martin, presentation editor — James Dean, wearing jeans and a T-shirt with my boyfriend's cigarettes rolled up in my sleeve.

Campus Fourum disappointing due to lack of humor, wit of past semesters; callers should avoid insulting remarks

VINCE JACOBSON/Collegian

CLINT MUDRICK

Wanted: decent Campus Fourum contributions. Must start all sentences with "yeah" and have extensive knowledge of squirrels. Pay nonexistent. For details, apply within.

I admit that I was spoiled. Spring 1999 saw the fourum in its infancy. A new establishment, the fledgling newspaper roundtable brought forth leaders in satire and cynicism from all corners of K-State. What resulted was a masterpiece in idiocy and a lesson in wit, something worthy of students' attention and time.

But then came summer, and with it a temporary reprise from the glorious Fourum. Sadly, the slack has yet to be picked up. The Fourum has been, undeniably and nearly without fail, disappointing.

What happened to the squirrel comments? Where did the stupid and predictable yet still entertaining Greek/non-Greek banter go? Why are no more disgruntled band people calling to tell us to "shut up!?"

Let me lay down a couple of facts here. The guys who call in every week with incredibly "witty" comments about an overrated football team need to give it up. We are among the best in the nation and, even though I have no doubt they could play better against absentminded referees and a lucky Sooner quarterback, the Monday-morning-fourum quarterbacks need to find a new subject or stay off the phone.

Along the same lines, enough with the Beasley/Roberson stuff. Hypocrisy is easy to see when our Fourum has our quarterback go from bust to presidential hopeful back to bust. The same applies for Ell Roberson, the man who went from the next Michael Vick to an unmentioned alternative. The reality is this: Beasley is a good quarterback who has the experience and abilities to take us to the BCS. Roberson is a freshman — yes, a freshman — with a tremendous amount of potential and the capabilities to lead us in the years to come. The game-by-game insults are unnecessary.

Thus, we come to the few Fourum contributions of the semester worth the reading. I will supply a couple examples. First, for relationships, we were graced with the weird yet semi-funny "You can tell your girlfriend wants to get serious when she hands you the Ten Commandments." Mystical but true.

From a column on females came, "I have spoken to pretty girls before, and there is nothing there but boobs and make-up." In reality, that is untrue; there also are halter tops, but that is beside the point.

Those quotes aside, there has been little of value this semester. I sorely miss some of the gems from last year. For the upperclassmen, consider this a stroll down memory lane. For the youngsters, here is a glance at what you have been denied. As so many good examples exist, I will divide into sections for clarity. So here they are, the best of last year's fourum.

Relationships: "I've learned one thing awfully quick at K-State. There's only one thing better than freshmen girls, and that's senior girls realizing they're never going to find Mr. Right." For the man worried about time allocation comes the story of one such guy. "Yesterday I beat Super Mario World I — twice. Later, my girlfriend dumped me. All in all, it was the best day of my life." What better insight is there?

Drinking: "This is for all of you who consume only 0-5 drinks. You need to start pulling your own weight, because I am tired of picking up the slack." Touché, Project Wellness.

Living arrangements (get ready to get mad all over again): "Greeks are good for one thing: free beer." And the response, "Dorm rats are good for one thing: free video game codes." Ah, the love.

Campus issues: "I think sex is going to be cheaper than parking permits this year." Yeah, but parking lasts a full semester, whereas sex ... never mind. "You might take my Napster, but you'll never take my porn." See, even geeks can be rebellious.

Squirrels: There were so many, for brevity's sake I cannot mention them. But among the topics were squirrel hunting and squirrels with backpacks. Did we forget about our rodent friends?

Philosophy: "Sometimes the darkness surrounds me like an old friend who wants to kill me and take my shoes. Fat chance, darkness." Just read it and move on. Finally, my favorite bit of philosophy: "What if the hokey-pokey really is what it's all about?" Confucius would be envious.

It is possible to have a funny fourum. We just need to stand up as a people, realize that anti-football talk is both played-out and annoying, and try to bring the fourum to where it was last year. To sum up not only this column but also the entire history of the oracle known as the fourum comes a defining quote from last year: "Everybody who calls the Fourum is stupid."

Global warming threatens coastal states

ZAC COOK

Everyone knows about the three eternal certainties in life. You can't escape laws, taxes or death.

Since the Industrial Revolution, a fourth evil villain has taken a chair at the edge of the round table. Unlike the other three, nobody seems to know that he's there.

It doesn't matter if you vote for George W. Bush, Al Gore, Ralph Nader or the others. It even affects the apathetic (read pathetic) people who choose not to vote and convicts who aren't even allowed to vote. The fourth villain already has been seated, and its name is Global Warming.

Many would argue that global warming is not a real threat, a so-called non-voting member at the table of evil certainties. But the opposite is true.

Within our lifetime, global warming has the opportunity to devastate humanity. You read it here first. Laws, taxes and even death all will pass away as mere memory if we do not solve the global warming problem. The other three aren't even blips on the radar screen.

Laws really aren't all that bad, and they keep things from reverting to anarchy.

Taxes also are positive because humans are naturally selfish and otherwise would not be generous in donating to the common welfare.

Death keeps people from forgetting they are mere mortals, although technological advances help them think otherwise.

Global warming is the definition of true devastation. You don't need a Ph.D. to figure it out. Crank up the greenhouse gases by burning fuels, which in turn fuels higher temperatures and you start melting ice. Melted ice turns to water, as we all know. For those of you who don't know, this water raises the sea level. Elementary, my dear Watson.

Most main cities in the United States lie on the coasts. Therefore, when the sea rises, bad things start happening.

With a small rise, everyone in these seaboard metropolae would have to start wearing capri pants. That's scary enough.

In the second phase of oceans rising, New York City to Washington, D.C., would look like a cement-bottomed rice paddy in Vietnam. Cultural, yes. Cheerful, no.

In the final phase of destruction, the Statue of Liberty's flame cresting the torch will resemble a floating candle in a bowl of water at a banquet. Reminiscent of high school prom, but not a positive scenario.

So maybe things won't get this bad. OK, you're right. They won't. And we live in Kansas, 3,000 feet above the scene of all the action. If the waters make it to Kansas, I won't be writing any more columns and you won't be reading any more columns. I'll be reading Revelation, packing up to Mount Everest, and listening to, "I told you so."

For now, we are lucky. I believe we are in the downward trend of a temperature cycle that stretches back a few hundred years. Our current greenhouse emissions therefore are not frying us, just keeping us toasty.

Some scientists try to say our emissions aren't causing any global warming, it's just the natural cycle warming us up. Word to their mothers.

I can tell you that the dinosaurs who lived in America didn't produce 63.7 million tons of on-road emissions per year. Also, their transportation wasn't 95-percent dependent on petroleum. Their transportation dependence was on energy drawn from fern fronds and other tasty dinosaurs.

However, those are the statistics from 1998 for Americans. How does it feel to have 500 pounds of carbon, sulfur, nitrogen and other emission derivatives strapped to your back? That's the average emissions produced by each citizen, and only transportation emissions are taken into account. Many more millions of tons of emissions come from industry each year.

What happens when the natural temperature cycle starts to increase and we are still producing this plethora of emissions? We will be in a world of hurt. There will be no debating that the Earth's average surface temperature could be increased between 2.7 and 11 degrees Fahrenheit in the next 100 years of industrialization. Waters will rise and cities near the sea will be swallowed. Our union will consist of about 40 states.

I, for one, will be joyously proclaiming, "I'm so glad I live in Kansas!" Won't you join me?

Kansas voters counted despite electoral college

Editor,

I am responding to a reader's opinion in Thursday's paper that a vote cast in Kansas has no value. This could not be further from the truth. There are many reasons to go to the polls Nov. 7, just as much here in Kansas as anywhere else in the nation.

It is a near certainty that George W. Bush will win Kansas's electoral votes, but this does not diminish the value of a vote cast for Bush or for another ticket. Whether or not the electoral votes go to your candidate, your vote will be counted and it is important, particularly in the popular vote.

The popular vote is the nationwide percentage of votes for each candidate. In an extremely close election such as this, it might happen that a candidate will lose the electoral vote but will win in the popular. What better way to discredit the electoral college than that? Thus, if you don't approve of the electoral college, all the more reason to show up at the polls.

The idea that supporters of a minority party should not vote because the majority will win the electoral votes is ridiculous. By that line of reasoning, why should the majority vote either? Why should anyone vote at all? Voter apathy is an increasing problem in this country, and fighting it is another important reason why you should vote this November.

In Thursday's letter, I found the comparison of voting to "urinating in the ocean" particularly disheartening. That ocean is the lifeblood of this country.

Electing leaders is the foundation of our Democracy. Unfortunately, with every election, as voter turnout continues to drop, that ocean is drying up.

How sad that, to quote Bill Vaughan, "A citizen of America will cross the ocean to fight for democracy, but won't cross the street to vote in a national election."

It is your duty as an American citizen to vote for who will lead this country.

No matter what ticket you support, no matter where you live, your voice will be heard.

Rules set for bikers, skaters

By MICHELLE BERTUGLIA
Kansas State Collegian

There are lots of creative ways for students to get to campus, whether it is biking or riding a scooter, but regardless of the transportation chosen, there are rules to be followed, said Darwin Abbot, director of K-State Parking Services.

The movement for a restructure within transportation began with parking services almost two years ago by laying down rules for bikers and skaters. Abbott said Parking Services sat down with campus police, the biking police and others to make sure those who dealt with people breaking the rules had specific rules to enforce.

"Non-students were coming in and skating and biking on handrails, and leaving sharp metal shreds and skating in buildings," Abbott said. "We needed to establish the rules, because people were violating their good senses."

Capt. Robert Mellgren of the K-State Police said there was a push for some kind of rules regarding biking and skating on campus. Mellgren said once those rules were in place, there were a lot of complaints. But over the past few years, Mellgren said he thinks some of the complaints have died down.

This year, there has been an influx of skateboards, roller blades and scooters on campus. Abbott said there are rules laid down for these kinds of transportation as well.

All of the rules are laid out on the Parking Services Web site, www.ksu.edu/parking. The site lists explicit guidelines for what can and cannot be done with bikes, skates and skateboards on campus. Mainly, the rules state people should only use bikes and skateboards on the designated university bike paths.

Abbott said skates can be used throughout the campus, but any skateboarding or trick skating in the middle of high traffic areas can result in a fine. Mellgren said if there is any question on rules, scooters should be treated like skateboards.

Abbott said he thinks the rules are pretty straightforward, and after they were established, a lot of the initial problems went away.

"I think the rules are designed to tell us what we probably already know, such as mutual respect," Abbott said.

The campus police are in charge of giving tickets to people who violate the campus rules for transportation. Mellgren said they try not to give a lot of tickets to bicyclers and the like on campus; rather, they work to educate and give warnings about unsafe behavior.

"We try to be as lenient as we can, we try to be nice guys and just give warnings," Mellgren said.

Brad Klein, senior in social work, said he bikes to campus almost every day. Klein said he thinks more people are biking because they don't want to deal with the hassle of parking their cars on campus, the sole reason Klein gave for using his bike.

"I bought my bike when I moved off campus," he said. "I live too close to drive, so I would rather walk or bike."

Abbott said he understands why students would want to use bikes, skates, scooters and skateboards on campus, but the important thing is safety for everyone.

"There are lots of different ways of getting around, but whenever you mix wheeled with unwheeled transportation in a densely populated area, there can be problems," he said.

Students help plan Topeka redevelopment

By ANGIE JOHNSON
Kansas State Collegian

This fall, three design studios in the College of Architecture, Planning and Design are working to form a collaborative design plan for the city of Topeka.

Students are working with the city to develop design proposals to create a downtown redevelopment plan. Developers and investors will approach different parts of the city using the plan.

"We basically want to make sense of Topeka while making things useful and profitable, and check out the feasibility of everything," Richard Lippincott, senior in interior design, said.

As parts of the Topeka area became vacant and disorganized, members of the community slowly moved away from the downtown area and into suburbs. The goal of the city is to bring people back to the metropolitan area to live, shop and work.

"As I design new office and retail buildings for the project, I find it interesting and also exciting that it is actually a real plan that will be implemented," Tuan Ngo, senior in architecture, said.

The plan began with students gathering information by interviewing Topeka officials, working on case studies and attending intensive design workshops to prepare for the project. Next, their duty was to work within inter-disciplinary groups to propose and execute a design plan, which is in the process.

"This is a different sort of exercise that students have never done before and it has proved to be a real challenge," David Sachs, associate professor of architecture, said.

By having K-State students idealize a plan and compare it with the original guidelines, it creates opportunities for realistic projects that will be assigned in the future, Lippincott said.

"The project will be very successful as it helps us to look at the city as a whole and not just one small part," he said.

Led by Cari Jensen's 20 kills, Cat volleyball team avenges previous loss to Red Raiders

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

K-State's volleyball team avenged an early season loss to the Red Raiders on Saturday by defeating Texas Tech in five games.

The Cats (15-6, 9-4) advanced their home winning streak to a school-record 13 matches by beating Tech (18-5, 7-5) at Ahearn Field House 15-9, 11-15, 15-6, 6-15, 15-12.

UP NEXT
K-State returns to action Saturday as the Wildcats travel to Austin, Texas., to tackle the Longhorns at 7 p.m.

K-State might have won the match, but early on, it looked as if the Red Raiders might dominate the Cats. Tech jumped out early in the first game with a 9-4 lead, but K-State fought back with 11 unanswered points to win.

The teams went on to seesaw back and forth before K-State finally took the match. The Cats did so with the help of freshman outside hitter Cari Jensen, who helped break a 12-12 tie in game five by hitting three critical kills.

Such an ending was particularly sweet for Jensen, as she missed on several fifth-game opportunities in the loss at Lubbock on Sept. 20.

For the match, Jensen racked up her eighth double-double with 20 kills and 15 digs.

That performance, combined with her 18 kills and 16 kills last Wednesday at Baylor, was good enough to earn her Co-Big 12 Conference Player of the Week.

Despite Jensen's performance on Saturday, however, the Cats won for the first time this season with a hitting percentage less than 20-percent, hitting only 17.1 percent on the day. Overall, K-State had more kills and digs than Tech, but the Cats were outblocked 18-8.

Still, a win is a win, and this one was much needed, head coach Jim McLaughlin said.

"This was a match we really

Cat runners finish year at Big 12 meet

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

K-State's women cross country squad fought through the altitude Saturday in Boulder, Colo., to finish second at the Big 12 Championships.

"My muscles were just shaking — I couldn't get any oxygen," senior Annie Wetterhus said. "My whole body felt numb."

However, head coach Randy Cole said mental errors played more of a factor than the change in elevation.

"We didn't adhere to the strategy we laid out," he said. "We paid the price later in the race."

That price came at the hands of meet-host Colorado, who won the event with 29 team points. K-State notched 81 points for second place, followed by Missouri (100), Texas A&M (114) and Oklahoma State (139) to round out the top five.

Individually, strategy paid a price for the Cats as well, Cole said.

Senior Korene Hinds and sophomore Amy Mortimer were among the top three during much of the race, but Hinds fell back to eighth place with a time of 20:59.

Mortimer also dropped to third position late, but said she had an extra push to overtake second with a time of 20:06.

"I couldn't let myself give up," Mortimer said. "I saw coach screaming at me, and I had to pass her."

Cole said he saw the fire in Mortimer's eyes as she closed out the race.

"Amy showed some savvy and would not give up," he said.

Meanwhile, Wetterhus and Cate Holston, a freshman from Topeka, were the only other Wildcats to place in the top 25, finishing 15th and 24th, respectively.

Nevertheless, one name missing from K-State's list of top performers was junior Amanda Crouse, who failed to finish in the top five for the first time in more than two years.

Mortimer said the high elevation affected the entire Wildcat squad to a certain extent.

"It was really difficult to get up the hill the second time," Mortimer said. "The altitude really got to me."

Altitude also played a factor on the men's side this weekend in Boulder, junior Shadrack Kimeli said, as the men nabbed 10th place with 241 points.

Sophomore cross country runner Amy Mortimer competes in a race at Warner Park earlier this season.

MATT STAMEY/ Collegian

Kimeli, Big 12 Newcomer of the Year, and senior Jean-Paul Niyongabo were both in the top three for much of the race before falling back in the pack.

Leading at the four-mile mark of the race, Kimeli said he encountered a large hill that proved too much for his stamina.

"The first mile was slow, and I was able to go out," he said. "Over the hill, I felt like my legs weren't moving."

Kimeli finished fifth in the race with a time of 25:11, while Niyongabo tallied 16th. However, the next best Wildcat performance was a distant 71st, was earned by junior Reid Christianson.

The Colorado men, like the Buffalo women, won their host meet with 16 points, while Oklahoma State (85) and Missouri (113) rounded out the top three.

Equestrian team continues to make strides

By STEVEN DEARINGER
Kansas State Collegian

K-State's Western equestrian team continued to move up in the ranks Saturday as it placed second in both shows at West Texas A&M in Canyon, Texas.

In the first show, the squad scored 20 points and finished behind West Texas A&M. It followed that with 21 points in the night performance, tying Texas A&M for second behind West Texas A&M.

"The girls did really well," Teresa Slough, head equestrian coach, said. "West Texas A&M is going to be tough all year, but we are hanging in with Texas A&M and Oklahoma State."

UP NEXT
The Western team will travel to Texas A&M for two shows Dec. 2-3.

The Oklahoma State Cowboys were the best in the country last year, and K-State has consistently placed above them in 2000.

"I think we did rather well considering this is our fifth show as a varsity sport," Jamie Dickson, Advanced I rider, said.

"We beat Oklahoma State in both shows after they were national champions last year."

Dickson received a second and fourth-place finish in the two Western event. Other riders with notable performances were Sarah Keller, Kara Nielsen, Janelle McAuley, Jessica Gittleman, Heather Hicks and Megan Hemberger, who all placed first in at least one ride.

Nielsen and Keller, Intermediate I riders, earned enough points to move up to Intermediate II, which requires 18 points.

To move from division to division, riders must earn 35 points. Nielsen placed first in both of her rides.

"I drew two different horses from the last meet in Canyon and they were nice draws for both shows, so I was able to carry out my patterns," Nielsen said.

And it wasn't just a good weekend for a few, she said, as the team made significant progress.

"K-State stepped up big time," Nielsen said. "More girls were placing, and the lower levels really came through."

Slough said she is especially seeing the beginners help out the team as well.

"Our beginners are extremely strong," she said. "We have the numbers at the lower level and they are a really talented group."

Cats' remaining home games to be televised despite loss

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

Saturday's contest between the Wildcats and Iowa State will be aired on the Fox Big 12 Over-the-Air Syndication regional. Consequently, the game time has been rescheduled for 11:30 a.m. local time.

Meanwhile, in other conference action, the Kansas/Nebraska game will be featured in ABC's regional coverage, while the intrastate battle between Texas and Texas Tech will air on Fox Sports Net national.

In addition, the Nov. 11 network schedule is as follows: Nebraska at K-State will be televised on Fox Sports Net Cable at 6 p.m. local time, Oklahoma at Texas A&M will air on ABC split national at noon, and the Iowa State/Colorado matchup can be seen on Fox Big 12 at 2:30 CST.

Loss to Texas A&M dashes big dreams for K-State

FRANK FLATON

What happened? Where did it all go wrong? Does anyone know?

This was supposed to be the year, right? There wasn't a time warp, "Twilight Zone" meets "Back to the Future" paradox that shifted us into a space time continuum of intergalactic turmoil and peril, was there? The millennium didn't shift the calendars to 1980, did it?

So, if none of that stuff happened, what did? Or better, why did K-State take the midseason dive and lose two games they were supposed to win?

It was there for the taking. The Cats had 15 starters, the starting quarterback, David Allen, two top-notch wide receivers and a brutal defense. The hype was ready for a break-out year.

Then they lost one game to Oklahoma, and the downward spiral continued. A lackluster performance against Texas Tech culminated into a 26-10 nightmare against Texas A&M.

How did this happen? What went wrong? Does anyone know? I'm asking because I don't have a clue.

The Wildcats' downfall could relate to many things. So here's some reasons to ponder. Maybe you can come up with your own theory.

1. The Slump Theory — Maybe the Oklahoma loss put the Cats in a slump. Oklahoma shocked them — nobody expected them to be that good. So K-State was morally wounded and they just couldn't get all cylinders running again.

2. The Booboo Theory — Injuries to the offensive line can seriously damage a team's rhythm, not to mention injuries to starting tight end Shad Meier and bruising fullback Johnno Lazetich.

"Everything starts with the offensive line," running back David Allen said. "A lot of our problems have to do with injuries. Injuries can hurt — especially on the line."

No matter how talented the running backs are or how great your wide receivers, it won't happen if the blocking assignments aren't executed with perfect precision.

3. The Schedule Theory — It's the national media's battle cry against the Cats. The early season cupcakes just don't prepare a team for tough competition against good teams.

Snyder insists the Wildcats work on what they need to do to get better, i.e., the opponent doesn't matter. But to get better you have to expose potential weaknesses. And K-State cannot assess the weaknesses if the opponents don't test them.

"The Big 12 defenses have a lot to do with it," o-lineman Milford Stephenson said. "We're not used to playing against these conference teams, and now we're in the heart of the conference schedule. We have some of our confidence, but we want to be the powerhouse that we felt like we were earlier in the season."

4. The Big 12 Is Pretty Damn Good Theory — With top-notch facilities and the recruiting budgets to get great players, every team in the Big 12 is getting better and better. With the exception of Baylor and Missouri, anyone can beat anyone on any given weekend.

"It's the Big 12," strong safety Jarrod Cooper said. "You should be happy winning just one game in the Big 12."

5. The Maybe They're Just Not As Good As Everyone Thought They Were Theory — I'd hate to end the column on a downer, but maybe this wasn't supposed to be the year.

K-State is one of the premier football teams in the country. Nobody doubts that. But, maybe this team just doesn't have what it takes to win the big games. Maybe Oklahoma and Texas A&M were just better teams.

Who knows, though?

AROUND CAMPUS

WHO: Jack O. Lantern, Junior in horticulture

LANTERN

Jack O. Lantern is originally from a farm in central Kansas. Jack, junior in horticulture, is a transfer student from Patch University.

He is a member of the Student Pumpkin Association and Pumpkins Against Mutilation Society.

Jack said one of his most memorable moments was when he made a guest appearance with his brothers and sisters in "It's The Great Pumpkin, Charlie Brown."

"I loved meeting all of the gang, especially Linus," Jack said. "He was the only one who really believed in us."

Even though Jack's favorite holiday is Halloween, he dreads Thanksgiving and said he sympathizes with the turkey.

When he's not hanging out on front porches, Jack spends his free time picketing "Smashing Pumpkins" concerts.

KAREN MIKOLS/Collegian

Manhattan resident Jami Ramsey decorates her house at Ninth and Bertrand streets inside and out for Halloween. She has been decorating it for about 10 years. "It just grew and got bigger and bigger," Ramsey said. "We just added onto our decorations. It's just such a fun holiday."

haunted house

Manhattan resident gets in spirit of Halloween with original decorations

By REED DUNN
Kansas State Collegian

Inside the black plastic-covered porch at the corner of ninth and Bertrand streets, several traditional Halloween characters are posed to greet trick-or-treaters. Black lights line the interior, and three carved pumpkins sit next to the front door. A cauldron of plastic bones sits nearby.

The mummy, alien and other costumed characters are part of the Halloween decorations that have spread to the exterior of Jami Ramsey's home. Ramsey said she began by decorating the interior of the house but wanted to use black plastic to transform the exterior.

"This is second only to Christmas in terms of excitement of the holidays," Ramsey said. "Black plastic, to me, just screams Halloween. As far as I'm concerned, black and orange is Halloween, like red and green is Christmas."

Ramsey does several things to make sure the holiday is a memorable one, especially for her youngest children, Owen and Taylor.

Her oldest son, Josh Patterson, freshman in political science and international studies, said he has always enjoyed the decorating process.

"I like our neighbors' reaction to our house, and watching the kids come up," Patterson said. "Most of the kids in our neighborhood really enjoy our house."

Each year, a new addition is made to the festive porch scene. Ramsey said she will continue to make additions until Taylor graduates.

"It's kind of scaring me," Ramsey said. "Each year we add something, and I have nine more years."

With the decorations, Ramsey always prepares a Halloween feast for her family. She said serving green spaghetti with deviled eggs disguised as eyeballs is one example of the traditional meal. For dessert she might serve a cat litter cake with melted Tootsie Rolls as a garnish.

"One year I even made a little man meatloaf with catsup on his chest, and a paring knife sticking in it," she said. "Sometimes it's hard for the kids to eat these things."

Using the Internet to find new recipes helps Ramsey keep each year a surprise. Part of tonight's meal might include meatballs filled with rice, Ramsey said.

"I think I can pawn them off as maggots," she said.

Patterson said he probably will leave his residence hall room to attend the annual feast.

He said though it is not always appealing, it is interesting to see what foods his mom will serve.

"I don't eat much on Halloween," he said.

When Ramsey's children were young, she made their costumes. As they got older, she let them create costumes from their own ideas.

Patterson said Halloween costumes have always been one of his mom's talents.

"She made a great kangaroo costume for me, and a neat Gumby costume for one of my brothers," he said. "When it comes to costumes and stuff like that, we always try to do something a little more over the top each year."

"This is second only to Christmas in terms of excitement of the holidays. Black plastic, to me, just screams halloween. As far as I am concerned, black and orange is Halloween, like red and green is Christmas."

Jami Ramsey, Manhattan resident

Dressing up as someone else is the aspect of Halloween that Ramsey said is fun for everyone. Children and adults alike have the chance to scare one another, she said.

"Wearing a mask allows you to be someone else," she said.

"I think part of it is that element of fear, but you know it's not going to be life-threatening."

With Halloween almost over, Ramsey said it will be time to start planning for Christmas. After that, it will be back to Halloween, she said.

"The kids look forward to what we are going to do," she said. "It's the excitement of the planning. It's become a family ritual."

Even though Halloween is fun for Ramsey and her children, she said her husband, Bob, has just learned to tolerate the excitement surrounding the decorating process.

"Pretty soon the whole house is going to be covered in black plastic," Ramsey said. "I think that's my husband's biggest fear."

Rowing pair earns 1st-place finish at regatta

By DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

K-State Open Pairs rowing combination took home first-place honors from the team's regatta for the second time in three weeks.

Iowa City was host to the Wildcats on Sunday for the 10th annual Head of the Iowa, and the Cats again took away top honors in the open pairs event.

Two weeks after junior Josie McClellan and sophomore Missy Darnell took the title at Kansas City's American Royal Fall Rowing Classic on Oct. 15, freshmen Samantha Allen and Katie Baxter pulled ahead of three boats from the University of Iowa to win the race with a time of 16:51.42.

McClellan and Darnell finished in fifth place this weekend, 34 seconds behind their Wildcat teammates, and another pairs boat powered by K-State juniors Glenna Yokum and Jill Anderson rounded out the Wildcats' three top-10 finishes in the pairs event with a time of 18:17.57.

However, after posting their best finish ever at the Head of the Charles event in Boston last weekend, the K-State-A open eight+ boat did not produce the kind of results the Wildcats were hoping for, head coach Jenny Hale said.

"It was not a strong row on the varsity's part," she said. "It wasn't up to par with how they rowed last weekend in Boston."

The "A" boat, rowed by junior coxswain Mo McGrath, Baxter, McClellan, Allen, Darnell, and sophomores Alyssa Adams, Katy Bockelman and Carissa Land, finished the race fifth with a time of 14:51.35, almost 48 seconds behind race-winner Iowa.

Hale said although the team's finish fell short of the goals set before the race, the team would improve this week in practice.

"I feel like we have a lot more in us," Hale said of her team's showing at the Head of the Iowa. "We have got to row a little more offensively. However, I think we did have some strong performances. We have some work to do in the next week, and we will get it done."

Likewise, the K-State-A novice eight+ boat, consisting of one junior and eight freshmen, finished the day with a fourth place time of 16:34.35, 48 seconds off of pace-setter Wisconsin's time.

Lindsey Hahn, freshman in open-option from Derby, Kan., said the novice team was impressive in her eyes.

"It felt a lot better than it had before," Hahn said. "We pulled together and rowed well. It was a great experience."

However, Hale said she also felt an even better finish would have been possible with more effort from both the varsity and novice crews.

"I would say overall that both squads get a solid 'B' for effort," Hale said. "I don't think that we tapped into our whole team's potential."

K-State's novice rowers did improve from last year's 11th place performance in the eight+ race, and head novice coach Kevin Harris said he was content with the young rowers' execution in Iowa City.

"I thought the Powercubs did really well today," Harris said. "We are in a good place and are looking forward to racing KU next weekend."

The University of Kansas is next on tap for the women's crew as K-State travels east this weekend to take on the Jayhawks in Saturday's Sunflower Showdown regatta.

"We're excited," Hahn said. "We want to go down there and show them what K-State can do."

needed to win," he said. "With the lineup we had on the floor, it was a match we had to have to prove we could get the win and get some confidence."

Alhough the team didn't play mistake-free ball, the Cats showed improvement from their loss to Tech, McLaughlin said.

"I remember down there Jensen swung for match point and hit it out of bounds, and she swings for it here and gets the kill, so we have made some progress," McLaughlin said.

"We showed some heart and some character tonight and rose to the occasion with our best hitting in game five."

said, "I'll not be campaigning in the traditional sense."

Campaign advisers for Mel Carnahan said they expected she would make a few appearances but primarily would try to keep her husband's name at the center of attention.

"A vote for Mel Carnahan is a vote they can make," she said. "They still have a choice. They'll be voting for Mel Carnahan."

Gov. Roger Wilson said the announcement clarifies a lot of uncertainty.

"I think it's obvious that Mel and Jean were a team, and nobody understands what he was trying to do better than Jean," Wilson said. "I am pleased that she would accept. I felt that would be the response."

John Hancock, executive director of the Missouri Republican Party, said Ashcroft "has conducted himself entirely appropriately throughout this unfortunate ordeal." He said Ashcroft's decision to suspend campaigning temporarily in the wake of the crash put him at a disadvantage.

"With a week to go and as voters begin to focus on the record of accomplishments that John Ashcroft has had over the years of service he has given this state, I fully expect them to give him a vote of confidence," Hancock said.

Clinton vetoes congressional pay raise

By ALAN FRAM
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — In a sharp escalation of their pre-election budget showdown, President Clinton vetoed a measure Monday allowing members of Congress a pay raise after top House Republicans shot down a tentative deal on a huge spending bill for school, labor and social programs.

The tit-for-tat seemed to increase the possibility that the escalating late-session budget battle, mostly invisible to the public until now, might influence next Tuesday's elections for control of the White House and Congress. It also made it likelier that lawmakers will have to return after Election Day for a lame-duck session.

"This is an open declaration of war against Congress," Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska, said before the veto, which White House officials had been dangling as a threat for several days.

GOP leaders in the House ratcheted up the battle earlier Monday, rejecting a tentative accord between their negotiators and White House officials on a $350 billion education and social spending measure. Their chief objection was a provision regarding proposed regulations on workplace safety long sought by unions and opposed by some business groups.

"We're not going to get pushed out of town with a bad deal," House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., told reporters. "You call it a stalemate. I call it fighting for the American people to get good legislation for them."

The GOP's willingness to prolong the budget battle underlined that Republican leaders seem to believe their party's prospects will not be hurt — and might well be helped — by keeping Congress in session rather than striking deals with Democrats and the White House that might rankle core constituencies.

In the hours before Clinton's veto, negotiations were under way between GOP and White House aides on the ergonomics provision. It was unclear how the veto would affect those talks.

White House officials and some Democrats, who had appeared ready to declare victory in the budget war and leave town for the elections, expressed dismay when Republican leaders turned down the compromise on the labor-education spending measure.

But looking to score points, House Minority Leader Dick Gephardt, D-Mo., accused Republicans of bowing to special interests and said, "This is not a do-nothing Congress, this is a dysfunctional Congress."

The bill Clinton vetoed — a $33 billion measure financing the Treasury Department — contained a $3,800 pay increase for lawmakers, boosting their annual salaries to $145,100. It also contains a GOP-sought phaseout of the 3 percent telephone tax and finances the White House's own operations.

The bill would have become law if Clinton had not vetoed it by midnight Monday.

Transit system subject of 2 open houses

By BRYAN SCRIBNER
Kansas State Collegian

Two open houses Thursday will help determine if a form of student transportation would be welcome on campus.

Karen Davis, director of community development for Manhattan, said the first open house will be at 2 p.m. in the K-State Student Union. The second will be at City Hall's City Commission room at 5:30 p.m.

The informational display will be the first public introduction of plans to initiate a transit system at K-State and in Manhattan, Davis said. It will be open to opinions and will provide results from a feasibility study and survey.

Davis said the city and university have researched transportation for more than two years. The city has been focusing on long-term planning.

The study is being conducted by TranSystems Corp. The Kansas Department of Transportation funded 80 percent of the project, and the city and university funded 20 percent.

Initial results concluded that a three-route system with nine buses would be beneficial for Manhattan. Each bus would transport 35 riders, and the system would cost $1.3 million annually. This plan, though, is preliminary and will require criticism from Manhattan residents, Davis said.

Darwin Abbott, director of Parking Services, said K-State is focused on developing a transport system in the near future. He said student input at the open house will help assure that the project would provide a useful service.

Abbott said he thinks a joint plan between the university and city is a good idea, but a shuttle system would be more feasible for students. If the city's transportation system does not develop as quickly as the university's, Abbott said he hoped the programs would overlap in the future.

"We're not locked in to any one specific system," he said. "Exactly how we do that will depend on surveys, questionnaires and discussion."

Abbott said the city's three-route plan would be an unnecessary and expensive project for the campus. He said a shuttle system would cost less and use fewer buses.

The shuttle system could use 1,000 student parking spaces at Bramlage Coliseum, Abbott said. Buses would offer transportation between the campus and Bramlage Coliseum.

Open Houses
Thursday:
2 p.m. – K-State Student Union
5:30 p.m. – City Hall, City Commission room

"There will be some learning involved in anything we do," Abbott said. "A shuttle system has to be reliable and timely."

Ted Rieck, TranSystems associate, said the consulting firm is researching existing conditions in Manhattan. He said they have identified people who would use the system and the most popular destinations in Manhattan.

A nine-student focus group favored a transportation system, but Rieck said many business owners did not feel it would be beneficial. He said he hoped the open house will present information that will encourage a response from students and residents.

"We encourage people to come by and give us their opinions," Rieck said.

A steering committee will use the ideas developed at the open houses, Davis said. She said the committee, which is comprised of about 17 city and university planners, would have a meeting Nov. 8. A finalized plan will then be presented to the City Commission in December.

Davis said additional open houses and an informational meeting would be continued next Spring. If the process identifies a favorable plan, she said the proposal could be finalized by April.

Polls close as election draws near

By NANCY FOSTER
Kansas State Collegian

A week ago Monday, Gov. George W. Bush was leading the voting polls by 2 percent. The next day, Vice President Al Gore was ahead by 1 percent. With one week left until Election Day, some speculate it might be the closest race since the 1960s.

ELECTIONS 2000

"There's no real outside issue," said Joseph Unekis, associate professor of political science. "Unless there's one within the next week, I think it's going to come right down to the wire."

He said the candidates' stances on many issues are similar, and without any outside issues, differentiating between the two might be hard.

"There's no burning issues, so there's no real issue to differentiate them," Unekis said. "They want to be all things to all people."

This might make it difficult for voters to choose between the candidates, he said. And for 18- to 24-year-olds, who have the lowest voter turnout, there's no real issues addressed at them to motivate them to go to the polls.

"They don't really speak to the young people too much," Unekis said. "When I was young, there was the draft and the Vietnam War."

Without issues that directly affect the 18 to 24 age bracket, many young people aren't being turned on to the race, he said.

Tabitha Pues, junior in music education, said she is choosing not to vote.

"I'm one of those people that doesn't think it makes a big difference," she said. "Everyone says your vote counts, but I don't know."

She said she's not very interested in the presidential race, and that she shouldn't vote if she's not educated on their political stances.

"The main reason is, I just haven't watched anything on the campaign or election at all," she said. "I feel I shouldn't vote if I don't know what's going on.

"I think you need to understand everything. I don't think it's right to not know, and to just go and vote and pick somebody."

She said she knew who the two main candidates were, and that was it.

Unekis said one reason for the close race might be because of the images the candidates portray.

"Gore comes across as a policy nerd and Bush as a lightweight," he said.

Chris Frank, sophomore in radio and television, said neither candidate has made a great impression on him.

"I personally don't care for either of them," he said. "I'm most likely going to vote Gore because I think he's a little clearer, but I think both of them say what it takes to get elected."

Frank said he finds their stance on issues similar.

"They take a stance on the issues just to get the votes, but on the most part don't really care that much about the issues," he said.

With the race being so close, Frank said he feels the voter turnout will be even less than before.

Students participate in Wefalds'

DAY OF SERVICE

By SHANNON MARSHALL
Kansas State Collegian

Working against a fierce autumn wind, a group of students diligently raked leaves in front of the Manhattan Emergency Shelter on Tuesday afternoon. They managed to transform a yard blanketed by a patchwork of red, yellow and orange into a carpet of green.

These students were participating in the second-annual Jon and Ruth Ann Wefald Day of Service, co-sponsored by K-State's Community Service Program and the Leadership Studies Program.

The day of service was on the second day of the universitywide Community Service Week. Students from Leadership Studies and Programs and University Experience classes participated in service activities ranging from Big Brothers and Big Sisters of Manhattan

Honor system strives for higher visibility in 2nd year

By ERIN DEHN
Kansas State Collegian

Honesty is the best policy, according to the small, green posters decorating walls and doors around campus. They serve as reminders of the integrity expected of students and faculty, and that cheating will not be tolerated.

These posters are part of the undergraduate honor system that was implemented in fall 1999. A year later, the system is still evolving to make honesty and integrity synonymous with K-State.

"So far, so good," said Phil Anderson, director of the honor system. "It seems to function better as time goes by."

Anderson said the number of reported violations of the honor system is on the rise from the previous year. At this time last year, the honor council was getting its first case. The final tally of cases for that semester was 10. So far this semester, Anderson said he knows of six cases and a possible seventh.

"The good news is, more and more people are aware of it, and more and more people know how to report it," Anderson said.

The system includes a council composed of faculty and students and a pledge that states, "On my honor, as a student, I've neither given nor received unauthorized aid on this academic work."

John Murray, professor of family studies and human services, places the honor pledge at the beginning of exams and asks students to sign their name, acknowledging their commitment to the policy.

"I think all students are bound by the honor code," Murray said. "This is just a reminder to them. You agree to be bound to the code when you apply to come to K-State."

The policy is applicable to all students, even those who refrain from signing their name.

Before the honor system was implemented, cheating was dealt with by faculty, department heads and deans.

Under the current system, situations are brought before a hearing panel that includes students as well as faculty. The hearing panel listens to testimony from the accused, the reporter, or the person accusing, and the case investigator. It then is under the jurisdiction of the panel to determine if a violation did occur and administrate the consequences.

Yet, there are many students unfamiliar with the system.

Heidi Heinrichs, sophomore in modern languages, said

"There's no real outside issue," said Joseph Unekis, associate professor of political science. "Unless there's one within the next week, I think it's going to come right down to the wire."

He said the candidates' stances on many issues are similar, and without any outside issues, differentiating between the two might be hard.

"There's no burning issues, so there's no real issue to differentiate them," Unekis said. "They want to be all things to all people."

This might make it difficult for voters to choose between the candidates, he said. And for 18- to 24-year-olds, who have the lowest voter turnout, there's no real issues addressed at them to motivate them to go to the polls.

"They don't really speak to the young people too much," Unekis said. "When I was young, there was the draft and the Vietnam War."

Without issues that directly affect the 18 to 24 age bracket, many young people aren't being turned on to the race, he said.

Tabitha Pues, junior in music education, said she is choosing not to vote.

"I'm one of those people that doesn't think it makes a big difference," she said. "Everyone says your vote counts, but I don't know."

She said she's not very interested in the presidential race, and that she shouldn't vote if she's not educated on their political stances.

"The main reason is, I just haven't watched anything on the campaign or election at all," she said. "I feel I shouldn't vote if I don't know what's going on.

"I think you need to understand everything. I don't think it's right to not know, and to just go and vote and pick somebody."

She said she knew who the two main candidates were, and that was it.

Unekis said one reason for the close race might be because of the images the candidates portray.

"Gore comes across as a policy nerd and Bush as a lightweight," he said.

Chris Frank, sophomore in radio and television, said neither candidate has made a great impression on him.

"I personally don't care for either of them," he said. "I'm most likely going to vote Gore because I think he's a little clearer, but I think both of them say what it takes to get elected."

Frank said he finds their stance on issues similar.

"They take a stance on the issues just to get the votes, but on the most part don't really care that much about the issues," he said.

With the race being so close, Frank said he feels the voter turnout will be even less than before.

"A lot of people I know don't particularly

Students participate in Wefalds'
DAY OF SERVICE

By SHANNON MARSHALL
Kansas State Collegian

Working against a fierce autumn wind, a group of students diligently raked leaves in front of the Manhattan Emergency Shelter on Tuesday afternoon. They managed to transform a yard blanketed by a patchwork of red, yellow and orange into a carpet of green.

These students were participating in the second-annual Jon and Ruth Ann Wefald Day of Service, co-sponsored by K-State's Community Service Program and the Leadership Studies Program.

The day of service was on the second day of the universitywide Community Service Week. Students from Leadership Studies and Programs and University Experience classes participated in service activities ranging from Big Brothers and Big Sisters of Manhattan

Honor system strives for higher visibility in 2nd year

By ERIN DEHN
Kansas State Collegian

Honesty is the best policy, according to the small, green posters decorating walls and doors around campus. They serve as reminders of the integrity expected of students and faculty, and that cheating will not be tolerated.

These posters are part of the undergraduate honor system that was implemented in fall 1999. A year later, the system is still evolving to make honesty and integrity synonymous with K-State.

"So far, so good," said Phil Anderson, director of the honor system. "It seems to function better as time goes by."

Anderson said the number of reported violations of the honor system is on the rise from the previous year. At this time last year, the honor council was getting its first case. The final tally of cases for that semester was 10. So far this semester, Anderson said he knows of six cases and a possible seventh.

"The good news is, more and more people are aware of it, and more and more people know how to report it," Anderson said.

The system includes a council composed of faculty and students and a pledge that states, "On my honor, as a student, I've neither given nor received unauthorized aid on this academic work."

John Murray, professor of family studies and human services, places the honor pledge at the beginning of exams and asks students to sign their name, acknowledging their commitment to the policy.

"I think all students are bound by the honor code," Murray said. "This is just a reminder to them. You agree to be bound to the code when you apply to come to K-State."

The policy is applicable to all students, even those who refrain from signing their name.

Before the honor system was implemented, cheating was dealt with by faculty, department heads and deans.

Under the current system, situations are brought before a hearing panel that includes students as well as faculty. The hearing panel listens to testimony from the accused, the reporter, or the person accusing, and the case investigator. It then is under the jurisdiction of the panel to determine if a violation did occur and administrate the consequences.

Yet, there are many students unfamiliar with the system.

Heidi Heinrichs, sophomore in modern languages, said

Family settles with WWF in wrongful death lawsuit

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The family of wrestler Owen Hart, who died in a botched stunt last year, has settled a wrongful death lawsuit against the World Wrestling Federation and the city.

Hart, known as the Blue Blazer, died May 23, 1999, when he plunged 78 feet when the quick-release mechanism on his harness prematurely opened as he was being lowered into the ring.

The 46-count suit was filed by Hart's widow, two minor children and his parents and contended that the stunt was dangerous and poorly planned and that the harness system was defective.

The settlement, which needs court approval, was filed Friday with the Missouri Court of Appeals. The appeals court had been scheduled to have a hearing Tuesday in a dispute over a document in the case.

Neither side disclosed terms of the settlement.

The WWF and the Hart family issued a joint statement Monday saying that the two parties "have come to an amicable agreement satisfactory to the parties, and the WWF will now continue the case against the entities which manufactured and sold the stunt equipment involved.

"We are awaiting the court's approval of the settlement, which is expected next week. The terms and conditions of the settlement otherwise speak for themselves."

The Kansas City Star quoted a source as saying the WWF had agreed to pay the Hart family $18 million.

The lawsuit was filed by Hart's widow, Martha Hart; the Harts' two children, ages 7 and 3 at the time of the accident; and Hart's parents, Stu and Helen Hart.

The WWF said it will continue the case and has signaled its intention to sue the companies who manufactured the harness.

Napster considers deal that pays music artists

NEW YORK — In a deal that could rescue Napster from legal limbo, Bertelsmann said Tuesday it was teaming with the Internet music-swapping service to develop a new membership-based distribution system that would guarantee payments to artists.

In exchange, the German media giant will drop its lawsuit against Napster, make its music catalog available and gain the right to buy a stake in Napster. Bertelsmann will, in the meantime, loan Napster money to help develop the subscription service.

The move marks a sharp break with other members of the music industry, which, along with Bertelsmann, sued Napster for copyright infringement, trying to shut down the free service on which millions trade bootleg recordings.

With labels such as Arista, RCA and Ariola, Bertelsmann sells records by artists such as Britney Spears, Whitney Houston, Kenny G and Carlos Santana.

Napster chief executive Hank Barry called the deal the right next step for the company. Barry recenily had said the company was thinking about charging monthly membership fees to users.

Napster has taken off since being founded last year by then-college freshman Shawn Fanning, snarling college computer networks and sparking public debate over whether intellectual property can be protected in the dawning Digital Age. The company is awaiting a federal appeals court ruling on whether it can continue operating pending trial in a suit filed by the recording industry.

FAA finds 107 violations in Boeing federal audit

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Boeing Co. will thoroughly analyze the way it makes airplanes — from design to manufacturing — to root out the cause of 107 problems uncovered by a federal audit, company officials say.

None of the problems threatened passenger safety, according to the Federal Aviation Administration's audit of seven Boeing facilities in the Pacific Northwest.

The FAA conducted the audit from December to February after what it called a series of high-visibility production breakdowns last fall. The audit found 87 problems in production and 20 in engineering.

"The findings show that these were not isolated events, that in fact they were systemic issues," John Hickey of the FAA said at a news conference Monday. "They illustrate that design and production systems are not functioning as intended at the Boeing Company."

New Chamber of Commerce president brings experience, people skills, wants to develop new Manhattan businesses

By JASON BECK
Kansas State Collegian

A man originally from Massachusetts is endeavoring to bring new businesses and opportunities to Manhattan.

He works closely with K-State, which is one of the reasons he came to Manhattan.

He makes it a point to have at least two Wildcat interns at all times.

Unfortunately, very few students know who he is.

Lyle Butler came to Manhattan this summer as president and CEO of the Manhattan Area Chamber of Commerce.

"The number one criteria was that he must have been the president of a chamber before," said Rich Seidler, a local businessman and former president of the Board of Directors. "We didn't want any second-in-commands. We wanted someone who had run the ship."

Butler has run the ship many times, and knows the game.

"The Chamber is an advocate of business," he said. "We're always working to attract new business and opportunities."

He has volunteered at various chambers since 1973, and in 1990, became president of the Dodge City Chamber of Commerce.

Butler started out in broadcast radio. After graduating from Ottawa University and getting his master's degree from Colorado State University, he took a job at a Fort Collins radio station in sales and management, which eventually led him to Dodge City.

working in the COMMUNITY

Who: Lyle Butler
Position: president and CEO of the Manhattan Area Chamber of Commerce

"Unfortunately," Butler said, "there was almost no possibility of advancement. Upward mobility was extremely limited."

So he took a job as vice president of marketing for a bank. He said there wasn't a great deal of change.

"In the 1980s, the banking industry was going through such a change that they needed people who could develop a market," Butler said. "My background in radio led me right to it."

Then, in late December, the position at Manhattan's Chamber opened.

As his last official act as chairman of the Board of Directors, Seidler appointed a search committee to look for a new head person.

From a field of 40 candidates, Butler was one of three finalists.

"He was who we wanted," Shirley Baker, chairman of the board, said. "He's extremely capable at marketing, and he's good at diffusing problems. He has superb people skills."

That's what Butler said he loves about his job.

"I love the opportunity to work with a diverse group," he said. "I learn from varied perspectives, and the most exiting thing for me is to bring diverse views together and accomplish a goal."

Students at K-State are one of the diverse groups with which he works.

"I really want to strengthen the ties with KSU," he said. "K-State has a lot of exciting programs, and a willingness to work with businesses."

So, for Butler, Manhattan is the perfect place to work.

KAREN MIKOLS/Collegian

Lyle Butler is the president and CEO of the Manhattan Area Chamber of Commerce. The Chamber of Commerce is at 501 Poyntz Ave.

"From KSU students to retired business people and in between," he said. "It's the citizens in Manhattan that make the community what it is."

"The quality of life at K-State was astounding," he said. "I see a lot of potential here in the next five years."

Engineering chapter wins national award for 6th consecutive year

By COLLEEN FOOTE
Kansas State Collegian

K-State's Chemical Engineering Chapter received the Outstanding Student Chapter Award for the sixth year in the row.

The chapter was one of only nine chapters out of the 150 chapters nationwide deemed worthy of the 1999-2000 national award. This places K-State's chapter in the top 6-percent nationwide this year. The chapter has remained in the top 10 percent of chapters nationwide for the last six years.

"It is an accomplishment that does much for department prestige nationally and clearly demonstrated the quality, enthusiasm and dedication of our students," said Stevin Gehrke, head of the Department of Chemical Engineering.

Qualifications for the award were based on the number of members in the organization, the level of student chapter participation and the activities planned and carried out by various committees.

"We have a large number of participation in the chapter," said Heath Wanamaker, chapter vice president and senior in chemical engineering. "We have a lot of fun within our chapter and it really shows."

One goal of the chapter is trying to keep the interest of freshman studying chemical engineering by helping them stay focused.

"We have a mentor program designed for freshman and upperclassmen," said Christina Elliot, former chapter president and senior in chemical engineering. "We try to get our students involved as early as we can to help get our numbers up."

Elliot said the chapter has a closeness that helps members stay involved in such activities as career guidance, community outreach, departmental activities, social and intramural events. This year the chapter became involved in many community service activities such as Adopt-a-Family, Habitat for Humanity, Flint Hills Breadbasket and a clothing drive.

"Whether we are participating in a social activity or a community service activity, our chapter has a unique closeness in everything we do," Elliot said.

Kaila Young, chapter community service chair and junior in chemical engineering, said the chapter members always are willing to get involved activities outside of the school.

"We always have people wanting to be involved in such things as intramurals, open house and attending national conferences," Young said.

Wanamaker said that, even though this is its sixth year in a row to win, the chapter doesn't take the award for granted and always works together.

"We always have the goal of winning the Outstanding Chapter Award," Wanamaker said. "But our main goal is always keeping our numbers high and staying involved within our chapter, because that is what makes us stand out nationally."

Forums provide needed details on transit issue

Students, it's time to speak up. Thursday will bring two forums concerning the transportation issue, with two different time segments, that students should make an effort to attend. The forums are sponsored by K-State and the city of Manhattan.

The first is in the Union from 2 until 4 p.m. The second is at City Hall from 5:30 until 7:30 p.m.

This is a chance for the student body to ask questions, find out the details and listen to both sides of the transportation issue.

Students of all years and majors attend, especially those students who are freshmen and sophomores, who will reap the benefits of the new transit system. Ultimately, they also will be the ones who will have to shell out money in order to pay for the benefits.

Parking has been a problem at this university for a considerable amount of time. The majority of students have complained about the parking issues through conversations, the ever-popular Campus Fourum, letters to the editor and several other ways. Now is the time to vocalize those concerns, because Parking Services is looking to providing a solution. The complaints now have a purpose.

It is important for students to show that they are fed up with the current parking pains. The best way is to attend the forum with something to say.

If you don't go, you can't complain.

KEN WELLS

Aren't we glad that's over with?

It's November — yes, penultimate month of the year, just a whisper away from finals. And we've survived the bacchanalian orgy of quasi-pagan revelry, excessively sugared snacks and malt liquor mayhem known as Hallowe'en. So before you pay your rent, it's time to regroup and recover.

First, if you were unfortunate enough to be host to a Hallowe'en festivity of some nature, you might be tripping over prone, unresponsive people in your home. This cannot be allowed. The polite, proper chain of events for removing persistent partygoers goes as follows: 1. Ask. 2. Ask loudly. 3. Kick in stomach. 4. Kick in face. 5. Claw at face. 6. Spray Lysol in face. 7. Use lit match and Lysol. If this fails, you're not trying hard enough.

Maybe your residence got toilet-papered. Assuming it's not too humid out, the toilet paper still should be suitably flammable. Ignite. Maybe stand by with a Super Soaker should things get a little out of hand. Eco-friendly? Don't worry, most things are biodegradable if we beat on them long enough.

The big question is probably how to preserve that precious costume you wore last night. Forget it. Lose it. Burn it with your toilet paper and implacable guest. Odds are you won't want to go as Jar Jar Binks two years in a row. Or maybe you'll start to remember just what you did to that partygoer in the vampire getup and you'll need to dispose of the evidence. (As for disposing of the memories, reacquire malt liquor — lather, rinse, repeat).

Sadly, inevitably, we finally reach problems that fire can't solve. Jack o' Lanterns, for all their positive values, fit under this category. Generally, they're too damp inside to burn. You have three options. 1. Dry it out, then burn it. 2. Soak it in gasoline prior to ignition (preferably from a safe distance). 3. Blow it up. Stuffing the hollowed-out pumpkin shell with leftover fireworks not only removes the burden of leftover Independence Day baggage, but allows you to spread pumpkin goodness over as many as three square blocks, if properly packed. Practice makes perfect. Again, though, distance is everything.

You're also probably suffering from a hangover (Or a concussion, if any of the above tips have backfired). Medication only dulls the pain. There's still society waiting to reopen the wounds. Invariably, your popularity triples when you're in severe pain. People sense this, and they instinctively want to help you. If only their idea of helping you recover wasn't to pat you on the back and SHOUT IN YOUR FACE REAL LOUD. First, give them a warning glare (grr!) and caution them to back away slowly. Some will persist in sharing merriment and intense cerebral pain. For each person who does this to you, you get one free Act of Retributory Violence. Use it wisely.

But if you did survive the festivity unscathed and relatively intact, that's no reason to let the revelry expire. Keep the holiday spirit alive. Find your most innocent coworker and promptly inform them, "I know what you did. I have the tapes." Do so anonymously if possible, via sticky-note or error message on their computer. Watch the panic (They look innocent, but it's all a facade, trust me). If they continue their bravado ("You didn't see anything!") include random qualifiers ("We have the goat" or "We talked to the Girl Scouts" or "The batteries are dead"). It's like lockpicking. Eventually, you will get that magical combination of incriminating circumstances to reduce the most competent, reliable worker to a quivering mass of flesh. And next to them, your production will seem stellar.

Most of all, learn from your mistakes. If everyone thought your "Harry Potter" costume actually was Woody Allen, next time allocate a few months for research/savings into costuming. If your "interactive Jack o' Lantern" display caused four coronaries, odds are you've put enough time/effort into that little endeavor. And if you get phone calls from each of your trick-or-treaters asking in a dull monotone for today's instructions, hey, that's time well spent.

But then, I've said too much.

Don't worry. If you're still nostalgic, the real freak show ends Tuesday.

Senior reflects on years at K-State, decides university needs to re-evaluate its priorities

my view

RICK WOOTEN

I enrolled for the final time last week. No, I did not become teary-eyed or have the alma mater play over in my head. Sitting at a lonely computer terminal did not make me wonder what happened to the fine blue-haired ladies up in Willard Hall. Those nine hours to be taken in spring 2001 are the only thing that stand between me and ... my diploma.

Three of the nine hours mentioned above will go toward Introduction to Philosophy. It is assuring to know that you can be held back from graduation because you haven't figured out yet whether the chicken or the egg came first. I realize that this isn't a vocational school, but couldn't they figure out something more important to take, such as Ticket Scalping or Drunken Public Speaking?

I got to thinking about what the eventual five years here at K-State have meant to me and what it means to my future. I came to the unfortunate realization that I came here in fall 1996 just as intelligent as I am now.

Sure, after being in the College of Business Administration for three years, I now know that Fannie Mae is not just the name of a character on "Hee-Haw" and going long on a stock doesn't mean sending Beasley out of the pocket so he can throw a Hail Mary to Microsoft.

I am in the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications. Even though I have been here longer than the oldest of squirrels, they have told me that I am not eligible to take a 400-level class in the department because it is reserved for sophomores and juniors. Call me crazy, but I thought seniority was the rule around here. I am not asking to take University Experience, for Snyder's sake.

Some of my fellow students and I also are limited in the equipment we can check out to complete our projects in our techniques classes. One class requires that we complete six different audio projects, yet the geniuses in JMC limit our checkouts of equipment to a total of 10 24-hour periods, with fines to back it.

While doing research for another class this semester, I learned that some of the resources that I needed were available at Sterling College in the metropolis of Sterling, Kan., or at Bethel or Bethany or any other fine small college. Hale Library didn't have it. What a shocker!

It is with these frustrations in mind that I am reporting to you with great confidence that most of what you learn in your time here at K-State is not in the classroom, but outside these hollow halls. Time spent learning how to take care of rent, bills, books and roommates rivals anything you might learn in Freshman Orientation.

Some of you might be surprised about what you can learn about our fine university even while not on campus. For example, a friend of mine who worked at facilities told me they were pulled off of other projects in summer 1999 so that they could work on a "playhouse" for Jon Wefald's grandchildren complete with stained glass windows. It is conveniently hidden behind his house and trees, but I think everyone who pays money to this university ought to enjoy it. At least we could play on the basketball goal in the driveway ... at 3 a.m. ... drunk.

Others might be interested in the fact that where I used to work in Pittman Hall is the home of some kind of new InfoTech Center. The stinker on this move is that an interior hallway that probably sees the feet of only two dozen different people every week is decked out to look like something from the Starship Enterprise. After questioning this, I was told that it wasn't my money that was spent there because I didn't live in the residence halls. So residence hall students, go check it out.

As a former student of Appreciation of Architecture class, I would like to remind our staffers that form should follow function.

To summarize, K-State still has a long way to go if it wishes to call itself a top-notch university.

Departments need funding, some people need to learn fiscal responsibility, and somebody should recognize that spending our resources watering our sidewalks in the summer and blowing leaves off of them in the fall is not good time management. Who's in charge here, anyway?

Students should vote against new student activities center

Editor:

On Nov. 9, I hope K-State students will vote against the student activities center.

The proposal is expensive and unnecessary. Considering the other platform issues Worcester and Pracht emphasized during their campaign, building this $4.8 million "hub" should be the last of priorities. Whatever happened to the idea of putting laser printers in the computing labs and bolstering efforts to increase the salaries of K-State faculty?

This student activities center, which might be useful in some respects, falls short of what needs to be done to improve K-State and student life. As president of K-State's Arts and Sciences College Council, the problem is not that K-State clubs/organizations need a place to meet, a phone and copy machine, or computers, or a desk for that matter. The Union conference rooms are a fine place to meet, and Kinko's has adequate office appliances. The rest is up to the resourcefulness of the clubs and their officers to take care of, which does not appear to be a problem now.

Furthermore, year after year, K-State clubs/organizations do not use the resources already available to them. For instance, Arts and Sciences Council allocates thousands of dollars each year to clubs, and each year, only a fraction of those funds actually are spent. In fact, Student Governing Association cut back allocations to Arts and Sciences Council by 25 percent because of the poor history of clubs to use those funds. So, if clubs/organizations aren't using the funds to which they have direct access, what makes SGA think a student activities center is necessary and a priority?

SGA should be developing ideas more along the lines of what is practical and really needed at K-State — not expensive plans for unfounded causes.

The value of RECYCLING

Local business encourages Manhattan residents to reuse household materials

By TRAVIS HOCHARD
Kansas State Collegian

To some, recycling means putting their empty cans or bottles in the recycling bin, as opposed to the trash can. To Howard Wilson, co-owner of Howie's Recycling, recycling is a business.

Howie's is a family operation. Wilson is the manager and co-owner along with his wife, Joann; his son, Greg; and his son-in-law, Craig Miller. They have two other full-time employees and three part-time employees.

"No one does just one thing around here," Joann Wilson said. "If they can't do it all, they look for a new job."

Howard Wilson got into the recycling business with his wife and son in 1984. They started with four reverse vending machines called "Golden Goats" that allowed people to dump aluminum cans at various sites and receive money.

"This allowed people to recycle cans, but we wanted to offer a larger service," Greg Wilson said.

In 1987, they bought a warehouse and started Howie's Recycling, which allowed them to accept more recyclable materials. Now, Howie's recycles aluminum cans, glass, plastic jugs and bottles, steel cans, paper, scrap metals, transmissions, radiators, car batteries, aluminum foil, computer parts and newspapers.

People bring their recyclable materials to Howie's, where they can separate them into recycling bins. From there, with the exception of glass, which is crushed, the materials are bailed and stored until there is enough to fill a semi-trailer. Howard Wilson then hires someone to deliver these materials to recycling plants across the Midwest.

"Basically, we get the stuff, clean it, process it and sell it," Howard Wilson said.

Where it is sold varies with each material — some newspapers and magazines remain loose and are shipped to Wellsville, Kan., where it is made into insulation.

Cardboard and other newspapers are bailed and shipped to Pryor, Okla., where it is made into recycled card board products such as the back of sheet-rock, the tube inside a toilet paper roll and even cardboard boxes.

Although Howie's does make money off of recycling, it doesn't make a profit on all the materials it accepts. Wilson said he breaks even and sometimes loses money on glass and steel cans, both 100-percent recyclable.

"I do it because I believe in recycling," Howard Wilson said. "We're all part of the problem, and we all need to do something about it."

The problem he is referring to is the amount of recyclable materials that piles up in landfills.

In cooperation with the Riley County Department of Household Hazardous Waste, Howie's also accepts alkaline batteries, motor oil, paint thinner, anti-freeze, butane bottles and gasoline on the second and fourth Saturday morning of every month.

Howie's also works in cooperation with K-State. The company also has worked with other small vendors and curbside pick-up companies.

Howard Wilson said he advises people to separate all recyclable material such as plastics, cardboard, steel cans, aluminum cans and glass bottles. If the availability of space and containers is an issue, some of these materials can be mixed when they get to Howie's.

When people recycle plastic containers such as milk jugs, they first should rinse them out and then step on them. The lids of all plastic containers also should be removed or the containers will not be accepted.

Ray Heuelsen, employee at Howie's Recycling, feeds aluminum cans into a chute before they are lifted onto a conveyor belt to be crushed. Howie's pays 25 cents a pound for aluminum cans if the total weight is less than 100 lbs.

Alicia Opheim dumps magazines into a bin for recycling at Howie's. "I do it because if we don't recycle, we're going to be buried in garbage," Opheim said.

DIFFERENT SEASONS

Veteran guards fill leadership roles

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

K-State's 2000-01women's basketball team derived its leadership from its senior post players a year ago.

The guards, especially Kim Woodlee and Kristin Rethman, added considerable scoring power, but they were not forced to carry the offensive load.

This year, however, those seniors, particularly Nikki Ramage and Angie Finkes, are gone and have been replaced with seven freshmen.

Thus, Woodlee, a senior, and Rethman, a junior, will be forced to lead the team, head coach Deb Patterson said.

"There are going to be times where we just flat out will need them to step up and bring some composure to the floor," she said. "I think it will require even more of our perimeter players. I don't know if there's enough — I'm not comfortable yet really quantifying or qualifying that.

"I know that I have a great deal of confidence in Kristin Rethman and Kim Woodlee — Morgen Finneran emerged as a very steady, fundamental player for us last year — and we're just going to have to lean on them."

To support that weight of inexperience, the upperclassmen will have to, as the saying goes, lead by example. The posts this year will be either freshmen or sophomores, so the guards must draw defenses away from the paint, Patterson said.

"We need that outside attack to prevent double teams inside, and that's where players like Kim Woodlee, Kristin Rethman, April Sailors and Morgen Finneran really need to step up for us," Patterson said, "because we need to extend the floor and we need to create one-on-one snares for those post players."

One way to extend the floor is shooting a high three-point percentage, one area in which both Woodlee and Rethman have excelled. Woodlee tops the K-State all-time charts in treys, while Rethman is not far behind, but they both need to improve, Patterson said.

"Kristin's going to have to continue to establish herself as a consistent three-point shooter because our post game is going to need that. They're going to need those in-and-out threats in order to be effective," she said.

In addition to leading with their play on the court, Woodlee and Rethman also have strived to strengthen communication within the team, Woodlee said.

"Sometimes you don't say something in fear that you're going to say the wrong thing. You don't ever want to make an upperclassman feel like you know more than they do, so you don't say it," she said. "So if there's one thing I want to be as a senior leader on this team, it's being approachable at any point in time."

Woodlee has done well in working towards that goal, freshman guard Laurie Koehn said.

"That's one of the stronger things about this team — we all are really open with each other," she said. "We can talk with each other about anything. We have confidence in each other and I think that carries over onto the court also and makes us a better team."

Freshman forward/center Andrea Armstrong also agreed that the communication and the resulting chemistry has been excellent so far in the preseason.

"That's the biggest thing I've noticed. We've only been together for a few weeks, and I feel like we're a close family. We all mesh well together and play well together," she said.

Because of that family atmosphere, the team is already communicating its goal for the season, and that goal has become a prepractice mantra, Woodlee said.

"Everybody on the team has one goal, and we want to win a Big 12 Championship. That is our goal, and that is what we say every day before practice," she said.

"That's we want, and that's what we're working towards."

Freshmen Koehn, Ohlde raise talent, skill levels

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

K-State's women's basketball team will look much different than last year. The senior leaders and top scorers are gone, and now more than half the roster is filled with freshmen.

Last season, the offense revolved around getting the ball into Nikki Ramage and Angie Finkes, strong post players who excelled in the paint. This year they have been replaced by tall and athletic, but relatively weak, freshmen.

One would expect the Cats to struggle, and preseason rankings reflect that feeling, picking K-State to finish ninth in the Big 12.

To those analysts' surprise, however, the Cats most apparent weakness might turn out to make them contenders. More specifically, freshman guard Laurie Koehn and freshman forward/center Nicole Ohlde bring a new level of athleticism to the squad, senior guard Kim Woodlee said.

"Laurie Koehn is better than your typical freshman. Nicole Ohlde is better than your typical freshman. These kids can play, and I've been very impressed with what they've done so far," she said. "I'm looking forward to bringing these freshmen in and letting everybody say, 'These are freshmen?' I'm excited."

Ohlde especially has impressed coaches from the get-go with her raw athletic ability, which isn't defined by her 6-foot, 4-inch height. Ohlde is not the typical tall, uncoordinated post player — she actually played guard in high school.

As a result, she immediately caught K-State's eye, head coach Deb Patterson said.

"I'm already seeing elements from Nicole Ohlde that we've never had in the gym before. She is able to really improve the tempo at which we play," Patterson said, "and she's a very effective scorer at this point early in the season, relatively untested, but she's already scoring well."

However, Ohlde's quickness, the reason behind her offensive prowess, also will cause her problems against physical Big 12 opponents. She won't be the strongest player on the floor, and teams will recognize that, Patterson said.

"Her first step around a defender and her ability to finish shots is going to be key. Because she's so athletic and because she can get so close to the rim, those are things she's going to have to be effective with," Patterson said, "because she will get battered, she will get pushed, she will get tested physically, and right now, that's definitely not her strength."

Ohlde, however, said she recognizes the mismatches and will try to improve in those areas in order to take full advantage of what skills she does possess.

"I've been trying to build my strength," she said. "Hopefully, I'll be able to use the certain abilities that I have. Hopefully, I can outquick them — just use my strength to their weakness."

Ohlde is not the only K-State newcomer to make quick impressions. Koehn, too, has shown great potential, being picked as the preseason Big 12 Freshman of the Year.

Koehn's greatest asset is one that has been missing from the Cat backcourt for the last several seasons — she can create her own shots, Patterson said.

"I think she's a player than can attack the basket and break people down off the dribble, and she has a jump shot," she said. "So, her versatility is a great strength."

That potential might have to wait awhile before being realized, however, as Koehn is suffering from an injured foot.

When she does return to the lineup, she, along with junior transfer Shalondra Booker, will help define an already strong backcourt.

As a result, it will be the post positions that are questioned most. Whether Ohlde and the rest of the young inside players can stand their positions in the paint remains to be seen, Patterson said.

Booker, for one, isn't worried. Wherever she puts the ball, the posts will get it and use their quickness to score, she said.

"Playing with Nicole Ohlde — I put it high and she'll go get it. Playing with Andrea Armstrong — I can hit her right in the gut with it, and she'll get it, drop it and take it strong to the basket.

"She's a very strong player," Booker said. "They can do everything. It seems to me like we have a team full of guards. There's nothing that we can do that the posts can't do."

Because of that high degree of talent across the roster, the Cats will enter the season deep at every position, Woodlee said.

"I feel like whoever's getting it done is going to be on the court, and I feel like there's a large amount of us getting it done the right way right now, which is great," she said. "We've never had the depth that we're going to have this year on our bench."

Wrestling club looks to improve previous tournament placing

By DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

Fans of the WWF would agree that sometimes wrestlers seem to have an uncanny way of knowing how a match will unfold.

Those wrestlers speak with confidence and sometimes even cockiness about their intimidation and ability.

The same is true for junior Marques Jackson, a two-time collegiate varsity letterman, who is in his first year at K-State after helping Neosho County Community College to a National Junior College Championship last year.

Jackson was entered in the K-State's intramural wrestling tournament earlier this fall and predicted that he would win it even before he stepped foot on the mats.

"I knew I'd win that tournament," Jackson said, and he did, notching a 19-8 final-round decision Sept. 29 to take the intramural championship.

That kind of power, captain Adam Hayes said, is what the wrestling club will be looking for this year when the Wildcats begin their season Nov. 4 at the Labette Community College tournament.

"I thought Marques was real dominating," Hayes said.

"A couple of guys fought him real hard, but he was real dominating in that tournament."

In only their third season in the National Collegiate Wrestling Association, K-State already has set some pretty lofty goals for itself, Hayes said.

The team will start the year ranked 10th in the nation after placing 14th at last year's national championship tournament, looking to finish just as well in Dallas, the site of the 2001 championship March 11.

"Our main goal is to win the conference title and place in the top 10 at nationals," Hayes said. "I don't see us dropping at all — we've got a good, tough schedule, but we've got a good work ethic and loose atmosphere in the wrestling room to balance it out."

Another recruit that will help K-State to that end this year will be sophomore Seth Lytle, a first-year Wildcat with four trips to the Kansas State High School Tournament to his name. Lytle said he believes his experience in those tournaments will help him adjust to the world of Cat wrestling.

"The experience is there," Lytle said. "Any time you go to state four times, you have a lot of big-time match experience and that really helps."

Hayes said he feels the team has gained two solid wrestlers to aid the Cats in this season's potential national title bid.

"Both Marques and Seth are really tough," Hayes said. "They are high-quality wrestlers that really get to it in the wrestling room."

K-State also will rely heavily on the experience of NCWA All-American returnees Shawn O'Toole and Chris Warren, head club wrestling coach Harold Jagerson said.

"Shawn and Chris complement each other well," he said. "Shawn is a kind of no-nonsense wrestler — he's about as gung-ho about it as they come. Chris' strength is his talent, and he lets that speak for him on the mats."

At last year's national tournament, the two wrestlers carried the Wildcats, finishing fifth and sixth, respectively.

Warren said he believes this year's crop of players are some of the best in the nation, and said the team's No. 10 preseason ranking might be a little low.

"I think that with the people that we have, 10th isn't good enough," Warren said. "We are good enough for the top five."

Nevertheless, Jagerson said the team is excited about their high preseason

Men's basketball team unlikely to have winning season, needs fan support

By RICHARD SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

RICH SMITH

I've long admitted that your average Tibetan sherpa has a better grasp of the finer points of college basketball than I, but this morning I'm preoccupied by a basketball reality so obvious, even I can understand it.

Let me clue you in on my insight:

Save for floods, famines, a rain of frogs and maybe a well-placed lightning strike or two on opposing Big 12 campuses, the K-State men's basketball team will not win the Big 12 title.

Bold prediction, I know, but I'm sticking to it.

The Wildcats will not be especially good this season. Their chances of avoiding another season in the conference's cellar sit on the low end of the probability scale — right between ample on-campus parking and another platinum album for Hootie and the Blowfish.

To reiterate — don't prepurchase any Final Four tickets. Have I made my point? Are you all with me so far? Super. Now that we're all on the same wavelength, I'll come to my point. Yeah, the Wildcats will lose — and that doesn't matter a bit. You should be out at Bramlage Coliseum for every single game, cheering them on.

What? Cheer for a team that loses its games? I can see K-State fans' jaws hitting the floor at that one. Then they'll go right back to pawning their Iowa State football tickets for $1.50 in loose change and a stick of gum.

I've been a Chiefs fan for two decades now, and I know how badly it sucks to root for a struggling team and watch them trip over their own shoelaces week in and week out.

It will be déjà vu with K-State basketball this year. They will struggle, they will lose — spectacularly, at times. But I know from experience that enduring the tough times can make the good ones all the sweeter. But it falls upon true fans to come out and support them regardless.

Wins and losses aside, there's plenty of reason to be excited about this season. The Cats have a new coaching staff that seems to genuinely care about getting the most out of this team, and fans can expect on-court intensity every game, at the least.

There is some talent here, too. Galen Morrison proved he could hit the outside jumper last season, and Quentin Buchanan showed flashes of being a legitimate playmaker. Travis Reynolds and Joe Leonard should be stronger in the post this year, and some promising newcomers add intrigue to the mix.

And the best part of all? Tom Asbury will be nowhere to be found. Wildcat fans have wanted to be rid of Asbury since about a year after he arrived. Finally, they have their wish — now they have to do their part in turning things around.

Fan support is vital for any college athletic team to win, but it's particularly true in basketball. New coach Jim Wooldridge has told fans and reporters at every turn that he needs their help in creating a home court advantage. It's like a mantra — I imagine he repeats it every night in his sleep as well.

But he's right about its importance. The raucous, deafening Ahearn Field House crowds in days of yore probably won the Wildcats a dozen games by themselves, easily. While Bramlage is not nearly as imposing as Ahearn, I think it has a potential that no one fully appreciates.

Everyone who's seen it filled with 15,000 fans (albeit KU fans) for one game every season knows what I'm talking about. Especially now that some nifty renovations have taken place, it can be a great basketball venue, but Wildcat fans just have to make it that way.

No, this is not the year the Wildcats will win the Big 12 basketball championship, but good things come to those who wait. Come out and support the basketball team nonetheless. Then, when they do win that title in a couple years, you can tell everyone you've been right there with them the whole time.

47 confirmed killed in crash of jet leaving Taiwan for L.A.

By WILLIAM FOREMAN
The Associated Press

TAIPEI, Taiwan — A Singapore Airlines 747 jetliner taking off for Los Angeles hit an object on the runway during a storm Tuesday night, scattering flaming wreckage across the tarmac. At least 47 people were killed, the airline said.

Singapore Airline spokesman Cheng Jeng-hsien in Taipei said that in addition to those killed, 84 people were injured and 48 were unaccounted for. But in Los Angeles, airline spokesman James Boyd gave different figures, saying 49 people were killed and 70 injured.

A full breakdown of those aboard Flight SQ006 was not immediately available, but Taiwanese civil aviation officials said 25 U.S. citizens, 44 Taiwanese and one Japanese were among them.

Three survivors said they felt the plane slam into something on the runway while trying to take off at Taipei's Chiang Kai-shek International Airport. Airline officials said the pilot also reported hitting an object on the runway, but no one offered an explanation of what it might have been. A China Airways official denied initial reports that the jumbo jet had hit one of its planes on the ground.

Despite the rain, video footage showed parts of the Boeing 747-400 series plane spewing flames and thick black smoke. Afterward, parts of the plane's blue fuselage appeared badly charred, with a gaping hole in the roof of the forward section.

"It felt like we bumped into something huge," said Doug Villermin, of New Iberia, La., who was standing outside a hospital afterward, wrapped in a tunic and smoking a cigarette. "It looked like the front end just fell off. From there, it just started to fall apart. I ran to the escape hatch with the stewardess but we couldn't get it open. Two feet away from me, I saw flames."

The aborted takeoff occurred at 11:18 p.m. Minutes later, ambulances and rescue vehicles crowded the wet tarmac, lights flashing.

Local TV reports showed a frantic scene at Chang Gung Memorial Hospital near the airport, where emergency room workers gently lifted injured people from ambulances. Some appeared to be burned. They laid on stretchers with their arms stretched stiffly in front of their torsos.

Tonya Joy, of New Zealand, was being pushed toward the operating room.

"I felt two hits and we twisted around twice," she said. "I jumped out of the top and landed on the ground, so the doctors think there is something wrong with my spine. The weather was just awful. Flames came so fast on both sides of the plane."

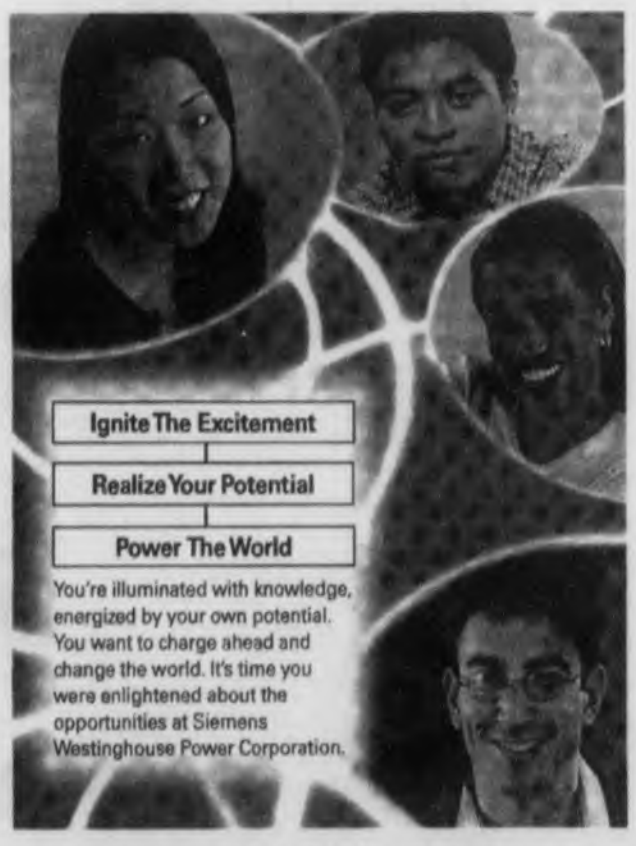
About a half-dozen relatives arrived Tuesday at the Los Angeles airport. They were escorted to a private room with counselors from the Red Cross to await news on the passengers, said B.V. Castillo, a Red Cross spokeswoman.

In Singapore, officials set up a crisis management center at Changi airport. A handful of relatives, some in tears, were led to the cordoned-off area by crisis workers.

Singapore Airlines, the South Asian city-state's flagship carrier, is one of the world's most profitable airlines. It has been flying for 28 years and never had crashed.

The plane that burst into flames Tuesday was bought new in January 1997, Boyd said. He said there had been no problems with the aircraft, which underwent its last maintenance check Sept. 16.

On Dec. 19, 1997, a SilkAir Boeing 737 was cruising over Indonesia at 35,000 feet when the jet suddenly nosed down, diving at supersonic speeds until it smashed into a river, killing all 104 people aboard. Singapore Airlines is the parent company of SilkAir.



The storm pounding Taiwan, Typhoon Xangsane, had whirled closer to the island's southern coast Tuesday and heavy rains have begun soaking the capital, Taipei. The typhoon and 90 mph winds were expected to make landfall by Wednesday if it maintained its current course, the Central Weather Bureau said.

Bombing suspects face questioning

By DONNA ABU-NASR
The Associated Press

LAHEJ, Yemen — Two Yemenis detained in the bombing of the USS Cole are believed to have taken part in attacks on Yemeni hotels in 1993 blamed on Islamic militants, sources close to the investigation said Tuesday.

The Yemenis were among nine men detained last week for questioning in connection with the Oct. 12 attack on the U.S. destroyer in Aden harbor that killed 17 U.S. sailors and injured 39 others.

The sources said the two were believed to have taken part in bombing attacks in December 1993 on Aden's two main hotels that killed and Austrian and a local janitor.

At that time, officials and diplomats said Muslim fundamentalists angered by Yemen's support for the U.S.-led relief operation in Somalia were behind the attacks. About 100 U.S. servicemen were in Aden then as part of the relief operation.

The investigation, the sources said, was increasingly centering on Lahej, an area 20 miles north of Aden and a stronghold of veterans of the war in Afganistan against the Soviets. It said all the nine detained men were from Lahej.

The sources — who spoke on condition they not be named — also said the investigation is focusing on four men believed to be the main plotters in the attack on the Cole. None of the four has been seen since the blast.

Paperwork relating to four identification cards issued between 1996 and 1997 has disappeared from government files, the sources said.

At least one of the cards is fake and was issued in Lahej. The card was used to register at least three houses and locations the bombers are believed to have used as well as a small boat used in the attack.

The suspects received money transfers from Gulf nations, including the United Arab Emirate. The sources did not have details on how much money the men had received.

The sources said investigators believe preparations for the blast began in March. They said a man went to the naval police base around that time to register a white boat using the fake identification.

When the man was asked to produce the boat for inspection, he said it was undergoing repairs and led police to a shack the suspects had used to weld linings into the boat to slip the explosives into, according to the sources.

The disclosures came as the United States pressed Yemeni authorities to allow U.S. agents a greater role in the investigation into the attack on the destroyer as it was refueling in Aden's harbor.

Yemeni officials have insisted they are leading the probe and said they did not want the United States to have the kind of high-profile role it had in the investigation in Kenya and Tanzania following the 1998 bombings of U.S. embassies there that killed 224 people. The United States has blamed those bombings on Saudi terrorist Osama Bin Laden.

Study challenges AIDS treatment

By LINDSEY TANNER
The Associated Press

CHICAGO — A study suggesting a vaccine-like AIDS treatment is ineffective has erupted in a public dispute between the manufacturer that paid for much of the study and doctors who say the company tried to squelch their research.

The study's conclusions, published in Wednesday's Journal of the American Medical Association, echo doubts about HIV-1 Immunogen expressed several years ago by advisers to the Food and Drug Administration.

The results suggest that when added to the drug regimen for HIV-infected patients, HIV-1 Immunogen failed to reduce the risk of developing full-blown AIDS. The drug carries the brand name Remune.

Immune Response Corp., the drug's manufacturer, contends researchers omitted favorable data and skewed the results.

The company entered a fairly common arbitration process during which it tried to produce a more balanced manuscript, said Dr. Ronald Moss, the company's vice president of medical and scientific affairs.

Instead, the researchers violated their contractual agreement and published incomplete findings, Moss said.

"It seems like tabloid journalism that JAMA would not investigate this further" before publishing, Moss said.

HIV-1 Immunogen was developed before powerful "drug cocktails" including protease inhibitors became standard HIV treatment, and Immune Response says subjects' use of such drugs affected the findings in the JAMA study.

Dr. James Kahn of the University of California at San Francisco, the study's lead author, said the company withheld important data and then tried to suppress publication.

In an arbitration complaint last month, Immune Response demanded $7 million to $10 million from Kahn and the university, claiming dissemination of the negative findings caused it financial harm, UCSF attorney Christopher Patti said.

The study of 2,527 patients nationwide found that Remune did boost levels of infection-fighting white blood cells, but the authors questioned whether the effect was clinically significant.

The university contends Kahn was allowed to publish the results.

JAMA editor Dr. Catherine DeAngelis defended the journal's decision to publish. In a JAMA editorial, she said the dispute illustrates what can happen when disagreement erupts between researchers and a funding sponsor who has a proprietary interest in the findings.

Moss said the study was published without the consent of some of the researchers. The company and one of the dissenting researchers, Dr. John Turner of Graduate Hospital in Philadelphia, drafted a letter Monday to DeAngelis, decrying publication of a manuscript that contains incomplete and inaccurate information.

ranking, along with the expectations it will bring for the program.

"We like that — we like the pressure because it makes us work and practice harder," Jagerson said. "It's good being 10th because it makes us work harder to keep it."

The Cats will have to do just that in order to win their first Southwest Conference Championship on Feb. 24 in Manhattan, something Jackson said will be a potential advantage for the team.

"The road to Dallas comes through K-State," he said, "so hopefully we'll have a big crowd out to support us."

Also on the schedule for this year are two dual meets against the University of Kansas, last year's conference champion. The matches are scheduled for Nov. 27 and Jan. 15. K-State was forced to settle for second place in the SWC last year after losing to the Jayhawks in the conference championships.

"I really do think that this rivalry brings the best out of everybody," Jagerson said. "It is important to wrestle KU very well."

As for Jackson's ability to predict the outcome of the season, he offers this ambitious pick.

"My prediction is that K-State will sneak up and take the national championship, and I will be in that match," he said.

Junior Marques Jackson, a member of the K-State wrestling club, competes in the intramural wrestling tournament earlier this semester.

U.S. prisoner sick in Russia

By ANGELA CHARLTON
The Associated Press

MOSCOW — Fueling his family's worst fears, jailed U.S. businessman Edmond Pope suffered an attack of joint and back pain Tuesday so acute it put his Moscow espionage trial on hold — and suggested his bone cancer might be back.

Pope, whose cancer was in remission when he came to Russia this spring, has spent six months in Moscow's dank, overcrowded Lefortovo prison, trying to win permission for an American doctor to examine him.

His pain Tuesday did not appear to advance that appeal.

After complaining of aches through the morning, Pope doubled over during his lunch break in a suspects' cage and asked for medical help, his lawyer Pavel Astakhov said. Pope was returned to the prison and examined by the same doctors who have insisted he is fit for trial.

Their diagnosis was terse: rheumatic inflammation of the back and hip joints. They ordered the 54-year-old Pope to rest for at least two days, and Judge Nina Barkina adjourned his trial until Nov. 2, Astakhov said.

"This is bone pain which is very terrifying to us and his family because that's how he first recognized his cancer when it first surfaced in the '80s," said Jennifer Bennett, spokeswoman for U.S. Rep. John Peterson of Pennsylvania, who has championed Pope's cause.

Pope's wife, Cheri, was devastated after she heard about the attack from news reports, Bennett said.

NEXT BIG THING

Group treading in famous comedy footsteps to appear at KSU

By DAVID LAUNDER
Kansas State Collegian

John Belushi, Bill Murray, Mike Myers and Chris Farley have more in common than "Saturday Night Live."

These actors and comedians once were part of "The Second City" touring company, which is coming to K-State this weekend.

Ticket holders will have the opportunity to watch some of the nation's greatest young stars perform live at Nichols Theatre on Friday.

"It's going to be a really fun show," said Thom Jackson, marketing and development officer at McCain Auditorium. "It will be a great way for students to relieve some stress and relax after midterms."

"The Second City," a Chicago-based touring group, performs all over the world.

Since opening its doors in 1959, Jackson said the production has been a springboard for young comedians.

In the early years, "The Second City" boasted such stars as Alan Arkin, Robert Kline and Fred Willard.

Throughout the years, "The Second City" blossomed and continued to produce some well-known names in the entertainment business, Jackson said.

Belushi, Murray, Myers and Farley are just part of the alumni who once toured the country.

As the company has become larger and more recognized, it has opened resident theaters in Toronto and Detroit, in addition to their original main stage in Chicago.

"The Second City" also spawned "SCTV," a late-night show on NBC that won an Emmy for best writing for a variety show in 1982.

"Through good fortune and good will, we have become very successful," said Beth Kligerman, associate producer for "The Second City." "Quite a few people have come here through the years to study improvisation and sketch comedy."

She said the years have left a rather large archive of material for current comedians to work with.

Performances by the troupe feature scenes and songs from the archives as well as some original material and improvisations.

Ensembles feature six performers, and musician and a stage manager.

"They're a very talented group of individuals," said John Kovelan, senior in human resource management and former Chicago-area resident. "I heard a great deal about them growing up. They're definitely first-rate entertainers."

Kovelan said with many recent alumni on NBC's "Saturday Night Live," including the show's head writer, some of the comedians coming to K-State could make a name for themselves one day.

"This is a great chance for people here to see some future stars before they become famous," Kovelan said.

MORE INFO?
The show is 7:30 and 9 p.m. Friday and Saturday at 7:30 p.m. Ticket prices will be $18 for the general public, $16 for senior citizens and $9 for K-State students and children. They can be purchased at the McCain Box Office or by calling 532-6328.

BirdHouse to feature popular folk artist

By KRISTEN DYMACEK
Kansas State Collegian

Greg Brown has accomplished something no other BirdHouse performer has accomplished.

Brown's tickets for his Friday's performance sold out faster than any other BirdHouse performer to date, David Kamerer, BirdHouse co-founder, said.

"He's one of the top songwriters on the circuit," Kamerer said. "Our tickets sold out two weeks ago. We've never sold out this fast."

For the 150 people who have the opportunity to attend the 8 p.m. performance at the Manhattan Arts Center, he said they will experience one of the best current singer/songwriters.

"He's a revered folk hero," Kamerer said. "He writes timeless songs. They are very beautiful and moving."

He said Brown's songs are a combination of genres.

"It's roots-based folk music with a rural country tradition," he said. "Greg is kind of a new slant of traditional blues."

The guitar-playing musician writes songs of longing for love and basic, elemental values, Kamerer said.

"He's real skeptical about technology and the good that comes from politics," he said. "He writes about friendship, community; things most of us consider important."

Brown, originally from Iowa, has released more than 15 albums, including his most recent, "Covenant."

He also started Red House Records, a record label for upcoming song writers, and has performed several times on National Public Radio's "A Prairie Home Companion." He also has been nominated for two Grammy Awards.

Besides performing in Manhattan, Brown will also be making stops this weekend in Lawrence; Hastings, Neb.; and Moundridge, Kan.

Gretchen Holden, BirdHouse board member, said Brown's résumé has made him a popular performer.

"He's in the big leagues," Holden said. "He's a little better-known. He's a little hotter."

She said the audience should be pleased with his performance.

"He just has a sort of fluidity," she said. "He's just a superb guitar player."

Even though tickets are sold out for Brown's performance, Kamerer said he wants people to be aware of the type of performers BirdHouse brings in.

"We want people to know we present people of Greg Brown's stature," he said. "We're just so damn proud to present him."

NEXT BIRDHOUSE PERFORMANCE
The next BirdHouse performer is John McCutcheon Dec. 2. Tickets for the event go on sale two weeks before the concert and can be purchased at the Dusty Bookshelf in Aggieville and the Manhattan Arts Center.

SERVICE

Inc., to volunteering at a local retirement community.

Aubrey Abbott Patterson, assistant director of Leadership Studies and Programs, said the day was an opportunity for students to become involved in the community.

"I think the chance to get involved and to see the needs of the community is invaluable," she said. "Our students seem to understand the value of the experience, if not before then definitely after the experience."

K-State President Jon Wefald and his wife, Ruth Ann, visited several sites where community service was in progress. Jon Wefald said he was pleased to see the number of students involved in community service.

"It's excellent to see the work the K-State students are doing to help the Manhattan area," he said.

Ruth Ann Wefald said she agreed, and said the day also served as a learning experience.

"I think it opens the eyes of the students to people's different needs," she said. "It's good education that you can't get from a book. I'm just so thankful to live in Manhattan, a good community made better by what K-State students are bringing to it."

Students in University Experience classes and Introduction to Leadership Concepts were offered the opportunity to participate in community service. Approximately 400 students already have participated or plan to participate in a service project this week.

Joyee Mazumder, freshman in computer engineering, volunteered to complete a University Experience requirement. She volunteered Tuesday at Stoneybrook Retirement Community and helped residents during a game of Bingo.

"I think helping people out really makes you grow as an individual," she said.

The Assisted Living Director of Stoneybrook, Janice Blazek, said the students have been an asset to the residents last week and this week as well.

"Some students have gotten here at eight in the morning and haven't left until six or eight at night," she said. "The residents have been loving it. The students have helped out with the Halloween party that we had, and just spent a lot of one-on-one time listening to the residents."

HONESTY

she has seen the honesty posters around campus, but doesn't know much about the program.

"A lot of people don't take cheating that seriously," she said. "But we're in college. We're adults. We should be responsible and mature enough to be honest."

Jennifer Kreifels, senior in family studies and human services, said she doesn't believe the honor code will eliminate cheating.

"I don't know if a lot of people take it to heart," she said. "But it is a good reminder you will suffer the consequences if you get caught."

The annual review of the 1999-2000 school year stated there were 25 alleged violations of the honor pledge involving 33 students.

Eighteen of those cases involved charges of plagiarism and 12 dealt with cheating on exams. Two cases involved fabricating labs and one involved fabricating an interview.

Some students found guilty of violations receive an XF for the course.

The "F" means failure of the class, and the "X" stands for violation of the policy.

The F remains on the students' transcripts permanently, while the X can be removed by successfully passing an Academic Integrity seminar.

Helene Marcoux, graduate student in educational psychology and graduate assistant on the honor system staff, instructed the first integrity seminar over the summer.

"I hold the class in a non-judgmental environment," she said. "A lot of people think you come to college and develop critically. I'm a firm believer that we're still growing morally."

Marcoux said she would like to see the class, which she said was a success during the summer, available for all students.

"Ethics is not something that is taught too often," she said.

Anderson said he encourages students to take advantage of the honor code Web site. This site offers access to style manuals, source citing, characteristics to integrity and other links students might find useful instead of resorting to cheating.

"Maybe 10 years from now, we won't have to remind people. It will be part of the culture," Murray said.

ELECTION

like either one of them.

They don't think there's a big difference voting between them, so they are choosing not to vote," he said.

Frank said although he wasn't thoroughly impressed with either candidate, his vote probably wouldn't be swayed within the next week.

Unekis said he thinks what the race will come down to will be which candidate swings the votes of the industrial states — Missouri, Michigan, Illinois, Pennsylvania and Ohio.

"That's where the election is probably going to be won or lost," he said.

Who will win these states?

Unekis said, "It's hard to tell."

Recreational Services' Office Located in Peters Recreation Complex

The Wellness Resource Center

From the time the Wellness Resource Center opened at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex, it has been a big success.

"Due to the demand for staying healthy, the number of patrons using the Wellness Resource Center has continued to increase since it first opened. A major attraction is being able to sit and visit with the fitness consultants in the privacy of the center," said Amanda Forsyth, Graduate Assistant for Fitness and Wellness at the Rec.

Wellness is a measure of an individual's physical, mental and social health. It is much more than the absence of disease or illness. It is the ability of people to reach their best potential in the broadest sense. The Fitness Consultants are there to aid in the success of each person's wellness.

The Wellness Resource Center is located on the main floor out at the Rec. There are currently four fitness consultants employed there, all with majors in either Kinesiology or Food & Exercise Science. Three of the fitness consultants have their NSCA certification for being a personal trainer.

There are many opportunities provided by the Wellness Resource Center. Some of the services offered are body fat testing, submax VO2 testing, strength and flexibility testing and blood pressure readings. They also offer a variety of magazine and periodicals for loan to their patrons. These services are all offered to students and facility card holders at no extra cost to them.

"The users of the Rec should really try to take advantage of what the Wellness Resource Center has to offer. It's hard to find places that provide these kinds of services at no charge, but more importantly, the fitness consultants are available for one-on-one guidance to help you improve or maintain your fitness and health," said Forsyth.

The fitness consultants work with participants on diet and exercise goals and help them design a program to follow. They also provide an orientation to the weight room and cardiovascular machines.

My Favorite Workout

Even though Robbie Dyson has only been in school for a few months, he has already made the Rec part of his routine. This freshman in Business and Pre Law is from Randolph, Kansas. Dyson enjoys coming to the Rec at least four times a week. His typical workout includes playing basketball and then lifting free weights. He usually comes to the Rec with friends or with his brother. Dyson has been lifting weights for about three years now. "I really want to stay in shape while I am here, so I keep lifting," said Dyson. In the short time he has been at K-State, Dyson says he has met a lot of new people and enjoys coming to the Rec for the atmosphere. "I have met a lot of new people and have fun whenever I come to the Rec," said Dyson. Dyson's best advice for other Rec goers is simple: "Get in shape and be healthy."

Who's Who at the Rec

Travis Redeker, junior in Kinesiology, has really enjoyed his past year and a half at the Rec as a fitness consultant. "I love the facility, and getting to meet and be around all of the different people that come in here. It is also good experience for my career." One of the major reasons Travis chose a job as a fitness consultant is because he likes to help people. "I enjoy helping people, plus this is great experience within my major," said Redeker. Travis plans to graduate in May 2002 and then attend physical therapy school.

For April Moeder, being a fitness consultant at the Rec seemed like a great way to incorporate her major with hands-on experience. "Being in the field of exercise science, I wanted to gain perspective on the recreational part," said Moeder. This senior in Kinesiology has been working as a fitness consultant for a year and a half and really enjoys her time spent with the clients. "Being a fitness consultant is definitely a rewarding job. I love the one-on-one with facility users and helping them gain confidence to continue making progress in our great facility," said Moeder. April will graduate in December and then plans to attend graduate school. She would eventually like to pursue a career in Health Promotion. Working at the Rec has allowed April to improve her communication skills and learn the importance of teamwork. It has also allowed April to develop a motto for her life: "Smiles are definitely contagious, even to those that seldom wear them."

WORDS OF WELLNESS

Pool Action

When the weather begins to turn colder and you want to stay fit through the winter, attend the water aerobics classes at the Natatorium held on Monday-Friday's from 11:30 a.m. - 12:30 p.m. and Monday & Wednesday's from 7:30-8:30 p.m. and 8:30-9:30 p.m. These classes are an excellent way to incorporate aerobic moves to increase your cardiovascular levels and toning moves to define and strengthen muscle groups. The harder you push against water, the harder it pushes back. With water providing about 12 times the resistance of air, each move you make helps strengthen muscle fibers. Using equipment like paddles, foam barbells and webbed gloves increases the surface area of your hands or feet in the water and resistance against the water even further.

Also offered at the Natatorium are Deep Water Jogging classes on Tuesday & Thursday's from 7:30-8:30 p.m. Running, jogging and walking under water in a pool not only strengthens the leg and hip muscles – the quadriceps, hamstring and gluteals – but helps to develop and improve cardiorespiratory fitness.

Working It Out

If you're looking for ways to tone up before the holidays, start by attending the various aerobics classes offered at the Rec Complex. Fit Flex, on Monday & Wednesday's from 8:25-9:25 p.m., is a super way to incorporate weights into your workout and will definitely help to tone and strengthen those muscles. If you're looking for a higher intensity workout to increase your cardiovascular strength, attend the Kardio Kick workouts on Tuesday & Thursday's from 5:25-6:25 p.m. Those who need a less rigorous workout but want to improve joint motion and flexibility will enjoy participating in the Jump Start classes on Monday, Wednesday & Friday's from 8:30-9:15 a.m. Make an effort now to be fit, healthy and happy!

Nutrition Notes

The holiday eating season is upon us, and we all know this means we indulge in special treats and high-calorie foods. With a little planning, you can enjoy the fun foods of the holidays without all the extra calories. Here are a few tips to make a delicious and healthier holiday meal:

- include lots of vegetables, both cooked and raw, fresh fruit or cranberry relish and of course, stuffing.
- Steam vegetables, then season with herbs, lemon or a small amount of Parmesan cheese.
- Buy white and sweet potatoes to provide flavor variety and a low-fat option. Green leaf or romaine lettuce for the salad and a mix of chopped fresh vegetables can help keep nutritional balance.
- Use low-fat butter or margarine on bread and potatoes.
- The final item on the menu should be the pumpkin for pie or custard. If you need whipped cream, try a low-fat or fat free version.

Another way to deal with all the food of the holidays is to increase your physical activity. After your Thanksgiving meal, take a family walk. Include physical activity in your daily holiday routine. It also helps you deal with stress. American Dietetic Association, 2000

Alcoholic Beverages: Drink in Moderation

Ever wondered if a nip of brandy will fight off a cold or if a hot toddy will warm you up? With colder weather, many people may want a little alcohol to stay warm, but the reality is alcohol can do just the opposite. Alcohol increases heat loss from the body so you may feel the cold even more. In terms of helping a cold, alcohol again loses. Alcohol can interfere with the body's ability to fight infection and it may interfere with medication you're taking. Beyond these effects, alcohol is lacking any nutritional value. The calories it provides carry no significant vitamins, minerals or other nutrients, so they're better used somewhere else. On this one go with the facts. Alcohol should be used in moderation and not as the answer to your health.

4 main groups looking into center's benefits

Campus preparing uses for possible extra space

By NANCY HULL
Kansas State Collegian

Campus buildings will have additional office space, if student organizations move out of their current offices and into the proposed student activities center.

Union Program Council, Greek Affairs, Student Governing Association and Multicultural Student Organizations eventually will move into the center if students vote in favor of it Nov. 9.

Union Program Council President Michael Rottinghaus said there has been talk of expanding the K-State Student Union's business offices, graphics office and meeting space if UPC leaves its office in the Union.

How the space is used will be determined by the Union, Student Body President Jake Worcester said. He said the space possibly could be used by a revenue generating source.

By NANCY HULL
Kansas State Collegian

The four cornerstone organizations of the proposed student activities center will experience a few changes, if the Nov. 9 referendum vote passes.

Student Governing Association, Multicultural Student Organizations, Union Program Council and Greek Affairs have been guaranteed office space in the three-floor addition to the east side of the K-State Student Union.

Another 120 organizations will be allotted cubicle space. Storage space, a project workroom and conference rooms would be available to all organizations in the center.

No organizations will lose space if they move into the center, Student Body Vice President Dana Pracht said. Physical resources in the offices are not finalized.

"There's not one set office size. Specifics on the offices will depend on the needs of the organizations," she said.

The Office of Student Activities and Services, which includes SGA, will become part of the proposed center. The existing OSAS will be reorganized to meet the needs of the center.

"SGA will hardly experience any changes," she said. "Our daily routines will be carried out the same."

Union Program Council president Michael Rottinghaus said the center would improve UPC's communications with other campus organizations.

"In the past we've had trouble getting more than one group to sponsor things with us. Organizations don't always realize what we can offer them," Rottinghaus said." By interacting with everyone on a daily basis, hopefully more organizations will do events with us."

Rottinghaus said UPC does not have a need for more office space. The constant contact with organizations is the biggest benefit of the center for UPC, Rottinghaus said.

Tadeo Franco, president of the Hispanic American Leadership Organization, said HALO will benefit if it moves from the Multicultural Student Organizations' current office on the first floor of the Union.

He said HALO would be able to store more items, such as historical papers and banners. Interacting with other organizations in the center is something Franco said he looks forward to.

"I think being around other organizations would motivate us to work more," Franco said.

Greek Affairs Adviser Barb Robel said Greek Affairs would gain office space, if it moved to the center, but it would continue to operate out of the current office in Holton Hall.

"The real benefit would be the interaction among student leaders," Robel said.

Members of Interfraternity Council and Panhallenic Council are in favor of the center, Robel said.

"They were saying how good it was that someone had this vision to bring everyone together."

Negative ads rise near end of race

By JAMIE BARRETT
Kansas State Collegian

The race for president is almost over, and the last week of the race is going to include name calling, mud slinging and personal attacks on candidates in advertisements and commercials.

David Procter, head of the department of Speech, Communication, Theater and Dance, said mudslinging advertisements and commercials are designed to drive up negative feelings toward opposing candidates and decrease the support of the people.

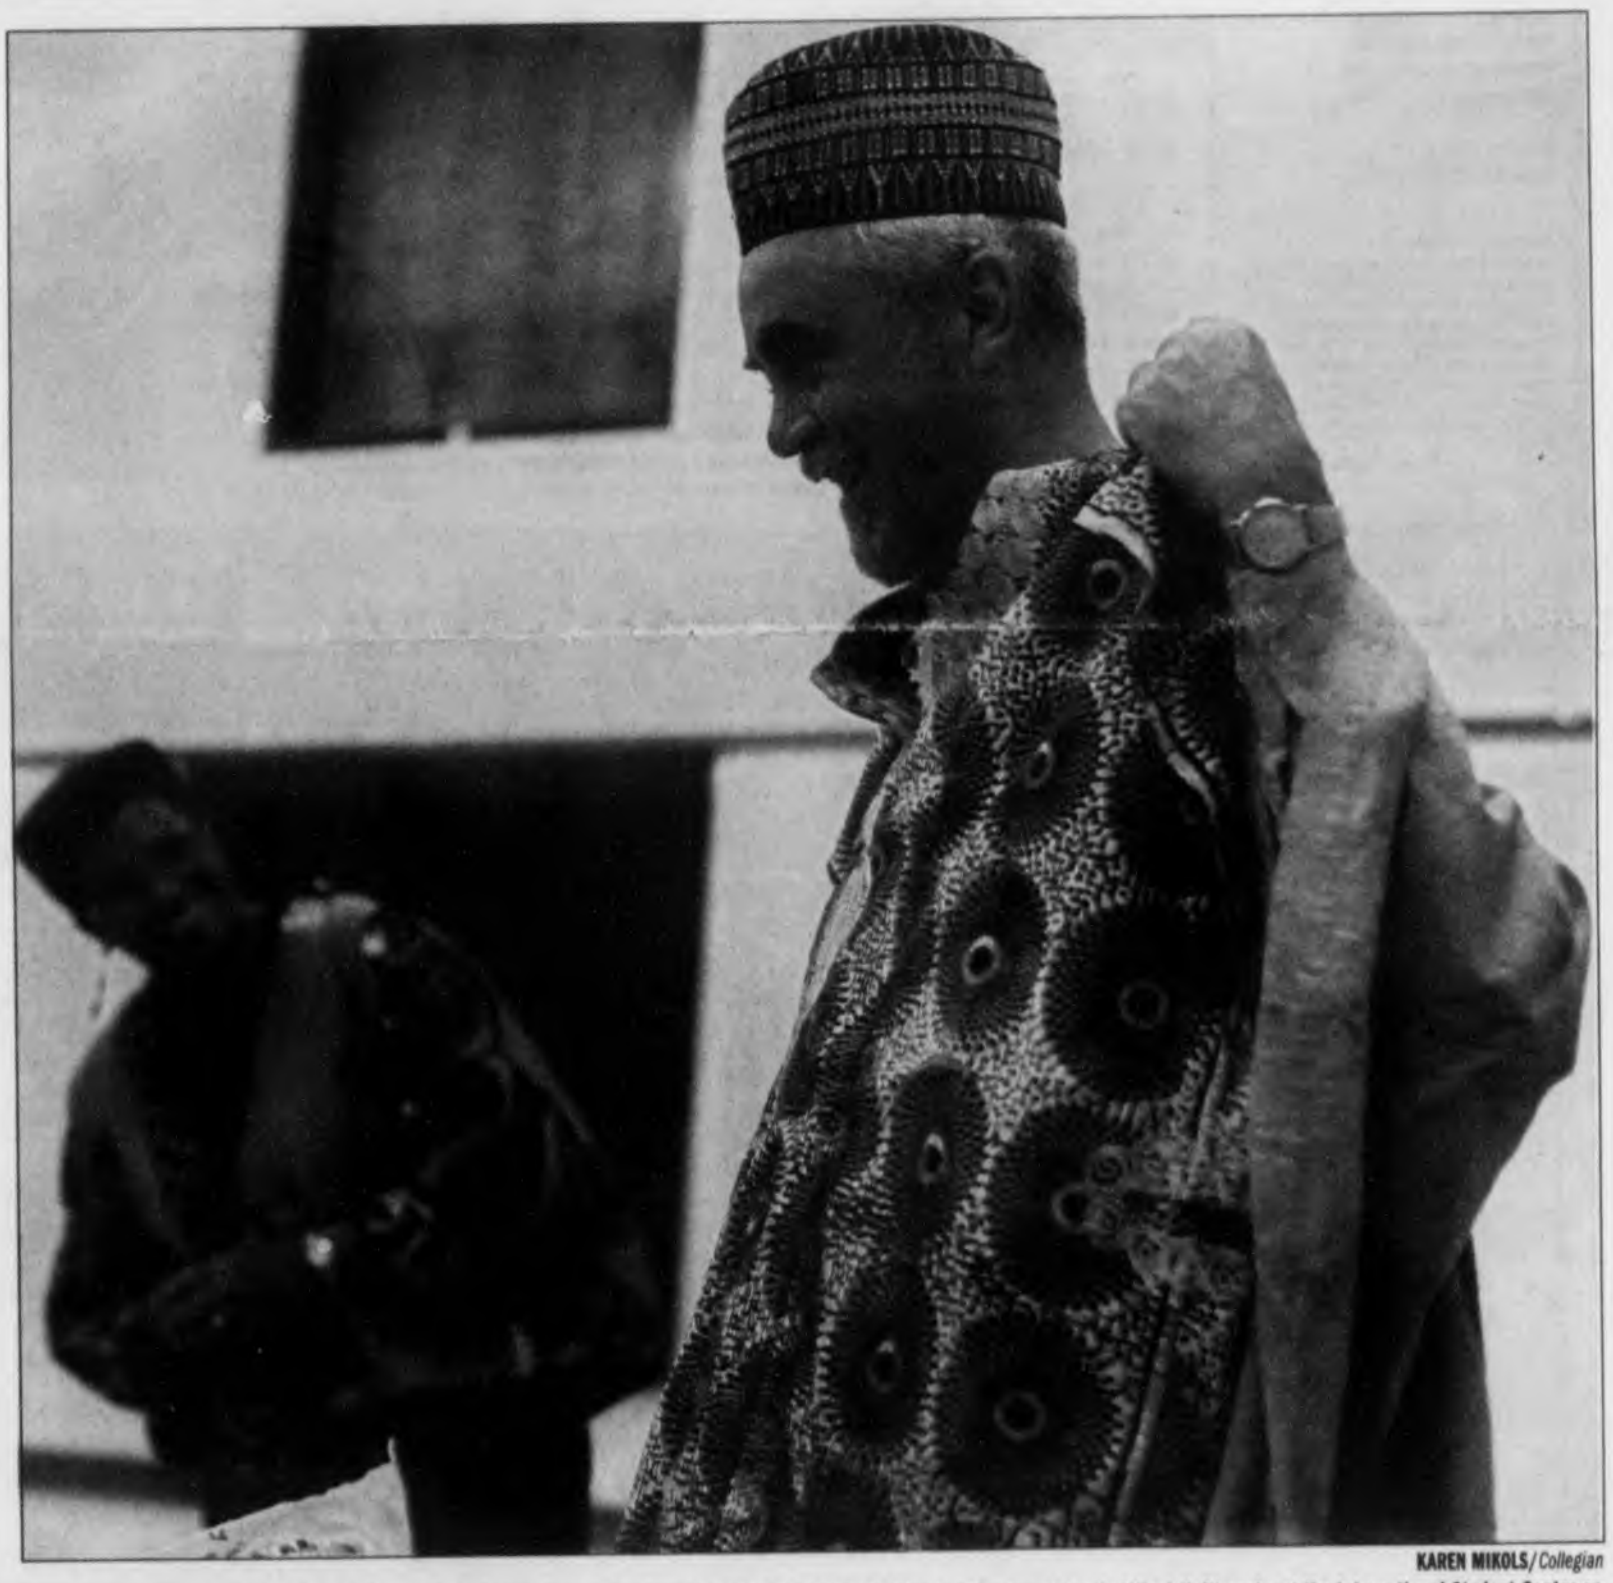
ELECTIONS 2000

"Ads like these shrink the number of people likely to vote," Procter said. "They are designed to turn people off from politicians and to keep the people who are undecided away from the polls. People who are undecided tend to become overwhelmed by negative advertisements and think that both sides are corrupt and simply do not vote for anyone."

Negative political advertisements are most abundant during the last few weeks of the election race. Advertisements tend to become more nasty and corruptive toward the end of the election to sway or discourage the people just tuning in to the race, Procter said.

He said the one advertisement he has seen that hurt the character of a candidate and discouraged the voters has been the "Daisy" advertisement.

"The daisy ad was run one time by President Johnson's campaign in 1964," Procter said. "I have recently seen it again being run by a Republican group. It is a shot of a little girl plucking the petals off a daisy in a field, and behind her there is a countdown to a nuclear bomb. The ad is supposed to imply that Clinton and Gore gave away nuclear secrets."



William Schenck-Hamlin, professor of speech communication, said political groups try to confuse and discourage voters who could be swayed to secure their own voters.

"Every candidate can be assured that they will have their hardcore supporters out to vote for them," Schenck-Hamlin said. "Some politicians want to discourage the undecided voters, who could be swayed. This ends up in them not voting at all, and that is what they are looking for."

Schenck-Hamlin said there are some advertisements driven to support the differences between candidates and inform the voters that are not intended to discourage or confuse them.

"If an ad is about an issue the public has something to work with, and they can decide whether to agree with them or not," Schenck-Hamlin said. "An attack ad just makes the people turn away from the

Myron Calhoun (right) retired professor of computer science, shows off a piece of clothing he bought in Nigeria after Gwendolyn S. Speaker delves into dimensions of dress inherent to culture

By ERIN DEHN
Kansas State Collegian

Vibrant colors, hair styles and hats and the reasons why they are worn were among the topics discussed by Gwendolyn S. O'Neal, professor of apparel, textiles and interior design, during the presentation "African-American Aesthetic of Dress."

Wednesday's presentation was in accordance with the International Coffee Hours, a series of presentations sponsored by the International Student Center.

The focus of O'Neal's research was to determine if an aesthetic, as she defined as that which is beautiful to the eyes and pleasing to the touch, exists in the African-American community.

"If we call it African-American, then we must be able to show there is a connection to Africa, not just the slave era," O'Neal said. "So I had to find its roots."

O'Neal interviewed African-Americans of all ages, read historical descriptions and slaves' writings to research the topic and to educate people on the meaning behind African-American dress.

"There's been so much misunderstanding in this culture, particularly with African-American males. So you see someone whose hair is different, and we fear these people are deviant," she said. "If we come to understand this is part of a cultural aesthetic, then you have no reason to fear."

O'Neal said there are four dimensions in the African-American dress. One dimension is the affinity for high-affect color.

"When I was growing up, I would hear people say, 'They wear all these wild colors.'" O'Neal said. "They wear bold, vibrant colors."

Style or individual expression is another dimension.

"In the African-American community, how something is worn is as important as what is worn," O'Neal said.

Improvisations and exotic features is a dimension expressed through such dress as hair styles and nails.

"Hair and nails are to an African-American woman as being thin is to European women," she said. "African-American men tend to say, 'I like to have something to hold on to.'"

Former principal contests child pornography charges

WICHITA — A federal judge is expected to rule this week on whether former principal Jeff Scott should be prosecuted for pictures of nude girls found in his desk at the Plainville Grade School.

Scott is charged with nine counts of receiving and possessing child pornography. Federal prosecutors say Scott should be punished for having pictures that showed girls performing sex acts. His trial is set for December.

His defense lawyer, Dan Monnat, argued that if the government prosecutes Scott, it also should go after those who check out controversial works by artists such as Jock Sturges and David Hamilton from the public library or from college research archives.

School officials testified this week that they did not recognize anyone from the photos as students from Plainville.

U.S. District Judge Wesley Brown is expected to decide this week if Scott's prosecution infringes on his First Amendment rights.

"I'm one of those people who gets very nervous about putting anyone in jail for looking at or reading anything," said Ted Frederickson, a University of Kansas professor who teaches First Amendment issues.

Body of 2-year-old found after search in Utah woods

SALT LAKE CITY — A 2-year-old boy was found dead in his pajamas in a snowy forest more than four days after his father reported leaving the toddler alone in his pickup while he went to scout for deer.

The cause of the boy's death was not immediately disclosed.

The discovery of Gage Wayment solved a part of the nearly week-old mystery. But it left a multitude of questions, including how he got out of his safety seat and out of the locked truck, how he ended up so far away and why his father left him alone.

Investigators were awaiting autopsy results Wednesday.

Paul Wayment told police Oct. 26 that he had parked his truck, with the boy sleeping and strapped in his car seat, while he scouted for deer in the rugged hills of a hunting area 35 miles from Salt Lake City.

He said he locked the truck, but when he returned about 40 minutes later the boy was gone. The truck showed no sign of forced entry.

Wayment has been questioned twice. "We are not referring to him as a suspect yet," sheriff's investigator Robert Berry said.

Investigators have discounted the likelihood of a kidnapper because the private hunting area is accessible only through a gate with a combination lock. And two hunters who said they saw the boy awake and smiling in the truck, after his father left, told police they were the only ones in the area.

There is no explanation for how the little boy got so far away from the truck that hundreds of searchers and dogs couldn't find him.

Congress evaluates funding of failing Russian economy

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Looking for quick results, the West poured $66 billion into Russia after the fall of the Soviet Union with no overall strategy or plan for the aid's use, a congressional report said Wednesday.

"The immense challenge of Russia's transition to a market economy and democratic society was underestimated by the international community and by Russians," the General Accounting Office report said.

The result of that additional food, trade and debt assistance was success in some individual programs but limited progress toward reform of its former communist system, it said.

It said the challenge of Russia's transition was greater than expected by the West and made harder because of lack of popular support for restructuring and because power and money were concentrated in the hands of a few.

"In hindsight, expectations within Russia and among the donors of achieving quick results were unrealistic," the report said.

The IMF suspended a $4.5 billion loan program to Russia last year, saying the government had failed to implement reforms.

Student speech leads to smoking petition

By BRYAN SCRIBNER
Kansas State Collegian

A student speech could result in an addition to the campus smoking policy.

Travis Hecht, senior in international marketing and agricultural business, recently gave a speech on K-State's smoking policy for his public speaking class. Hecht gave reasons why he thinks no-smoking signs should be placed throughout the campus.

Hecht's speech instructor, Phil Anderson, said he encourages his students to investigate speech topics that deal with campus issues. After receiving encouragement from his class and K-State faculty members, Hecht decided to actively pursue a policy change.

"I don't smoke and don't like to walk through smoke outside of buildings," Hecht said.

The current K-State smoking policy prohibits smoking only in enclosed areas.

After being fined for violating the Americans With Disabilities Act, the University of Kansas recently enacted a similar revision to its smoking policy. The policy mandates that at least one entrance to every campus building is smoke-free within a 20-foot radius. Signs are posted at these entrances.

It would cost about $2,000 to place similar signs at one entrance of every K-State building, Hecht said. If every entrance received a sign, he said it would cost $8,000.

"For students I thought about personal rights," he said. "This would keep the university from having a court case."

Steve Galitzer, director of health and safety for K-State, said Hecht sent a petition with 45 signatures to his office.

He said the proposal would be debated by the Environmental Health and Safety Committee on Nov. 9.

"What we have to look into is what information is out there on the danger of second-hand smoke," Galitzer said. "There are a lot of problems with these kinds of rules."

Galitzer said it would be difficult to enforce a no-smoking radius of 20 feet. He said investigation into the proposal is at a premature stage.

"We need a panel of people to look at it," he said. "It would be a shame to put a policy in place that didn't work."

If the addition to the smoking policy is accepted by K-State, Galitzer said it would not require student funding, because campus buildings also are used by faculty, staff and visitors.

The funding, though, is not available within a university budget, he said.

Technology fair draws crowd to observe

LATEST ADVANCEMENTS

By COLLEEN FOOTE
Kansas State Collegian

Everyone from the technological expert to the novice were able to observe new and old advancements Wednesday at the K-State Student Union Computer Store's technology fair.

The fair included demonstrations of the latest technological advancements and more than $1,000 in prizes.

Apple, Gateway, ITP, Thomson Press and Pearson Press were some of the companies that had representatives on hand to display their newest software and hardware.

"The fair was an informal setting for anyone to ask a question, from novice to experts," said Chris Loehr, computer buyer for the K-State Union Bookstore.

One attraction at the fair was a Mac museum, which gave visitors a view of how much Macintosh has changed throughout the years.

"The Mac museum was really interesting, because it shows how much computers have advanced over the years," Jill Hadley, junior in finance, said.

"It's amazing to see how small the computers have become in the last 20 years."

The fair attracted many visitors because it was not a sales environment, Loehr said. Many times, computer novices are afraid to ask questions in sales environments, because there always is a pressure to buy, and the fair allowed people to ask any question without feeling pressured or obligated to buy anything, he said.

Michael Yops, a campus representative for Apple, said people had many questions about new products and questions about problems they were having with their computers.

The fair also offered many events that catered to the technological person's curiosity, including presentations by Apple and a presentation on "Creating Digital Video For the Web."

Visitors also were able to view "OS X — Apple's Next Generation Operating System."

"This fair was a great opportunity to observe and ask questions about all of the latest and greatest stuff that technology offers," Yops said. "Each year there are more computer advancements, and this fair gave a chance for people to learn about them."

Students can help enhance life at K-State

K-State students should demand a high level of service from their student government.

They have their positions to better serve the student body as a whole, not just parts of it.

It is important that when students, either an individual or in a group, feel strongly about something, they take a stand.

This happened recently. A student gave a speech in his public speaking course that could result in an addition to the campus smoking policy.

Smoking on campus is only prohibited inside of the buildings, thus enclosed areas. This student suggested that no-smoking signs should be placed throughout campus to remind smokers to avoid lounging near entrances to buildings. If one sign was placed at one entrance of every building, it would cost $2,000. If there was a sign above every entrance, it would have an estimated cost of $8,000.

The student then obtained 45 signatures and sent it to the director of health and safety for K-State, Steve Galitzer. The proposal will be debated by the Environmental Health and Safety Committee on Nov. 9.

This shows that one student can attempt to make a difference — that a class project or assignment could turn into additional rules for the entire campus.

Situations like this should give even more students an encouragement to take stances on things they think need to be changed.

When students elect representatives, especially Student Body President Jake Worcester and Vice President Dana Pracht, candidates promise to do things to benefit the campus. We need to hold them to those promises. In order to do that, students cannot just let them make decisions and make the rules without giving our input.

Continue to call the Campus Fourum with suggestions and complaints, but if you want something done, call the Student Governing Association at 532-6541.

The Collegian's Campus Fourum is an anonymous call-in system that allows readers to voice their opinions on topics relevant to the publication.

Not only has K-State proven the existence of the massless invisible particle, but we've also proved that students have fewer than five drinks when they party. Coincidence? I think not.

To the guy in Aggieville yesterday — you know who you are — I am sorry. I really did think that was your costume.

If a tree falls in the forest and hits a squirrel, does Clint write a column about it?

To whoever thinks that Texas A&M's quarterback is pathetic: they outplayed us.

People keep telling me about this thing called sleep, but I am not entirely sure what they are talking about.

Hey, Rick — if K-State sucks so much, then why did you spend five years here?

One thing that college teaches you is how much sleep you really need.

As I recall, Aaron Lockett was also the only Wildcat to drop a touchdown pass against Texas A&M.

I am graduating in December, and all I really want to see changed is the misspelling of the word circulation on the library's fourth floor directory. That looks really nice.

The Royal Treatment

Consumers need to be more patient, understanding with customer service

MIAH WHITAKER

Everybody is a consumer. We all buy and use things. We all know the adage "the customer is always right."

Except that adage isn't necessarily true.

I've done my share of customer service work over the years. I've done the phone service, the retail sales, the grocery clerking — I've even tried my hand at being part of a wait staff. I've learned that a good customer service person will do everything he or she can to make the current customer's problem seem to be the most important thing on his or her mind. Whether the customer is right or wrong, the person behind the counter will do whatever he or she can to end up with a win-win outcome, something with which both parties are satisfied.

It's common sense: if you treat the customers well, they'll return the next time they need whatever it is you provide. Many businesses take pride in their customer return rate. Repeat business and word of mouth are what keep many smaller businesses in the black.

On the other side of the counter is the consumer, those of us who spend our hard-earned money at those small businesses. How often do we go into a consumer situation mistakenly believing "the customer is always right" as if that gives us license to make the lives of the unfortunate individual behind the counter a living hell?

I've been on both sides of the counter, and I can tell you that as important as good customer service is, it can be nullified if the customer acts like a jerk.

• Don't treat salespeople like your personal shoppers. They're there if you need assistance. If you don't, just say so and they'll happily wander off. Don't insist that they follow you around the store, carrying your items like a human shopping cart. That only keeps them from being able to help anyone else.

If they offer to take your items to the front of the store, so you can continue your shopping, that's fine. It's actually kind of handy when you're setting in for a long day of shopping.

• It's also pretty rude to drop off tons of stuff at the register, as if you're ready to check out and then wander off to finish shopping without letting the person behind the register know you're just storing your things. The poor cashier is going to assume you've forgotten an item and will be coming right back. That leaves the cashier stuck in the middle of a transaction, unsure of when you might be returning.

• When you call a business because the item you ordered just arrived in the mail, and it's either defective or not what you wanted, try to remain patient. The chances of the person on the other end of the line being the person who either made the item or took your original phone call are pretty slim. They're going to want to help you, but they might not know exactly what you're talking about at first.

• Another thing, and this drove me crazy when I ran the phones at a publishing company over the summer: try to remember that you might not be the only customer being dealt with. I worked customer service for the freshmen records of almost 300 different colleges and universities, and almost every person who called assumed theirs was the only school I worked with. When I couldn't immediately remember the information they requested, they would grow impatient.

• All of us like to save money. If you have coupons or get a discount, please let the cashier know before he or she starts ringing up your sale. If you wait until the sale is totaled to mention your 20-percent-off coupon, he or she will have to redo the entire thing.

• When you're at a restaurant, don't do anything you wouldn't do at home. Better yet, don't do anything you wouldn't want to clean up at your own home. Leaving a mess in a fast-food restaurant is an inconsiderate thing to do. It's a pain for the employees who have to clean up after you, and it makes it harder for the other customers to find a place to sit.

• Finally, remember that some people work hard for tips. If your waiter or waitress has been helpful and remembered to check on you and kept your glass full, leave him or her a tip. Waitresses and waiters tend to remember the party of six who spent four hours being royal pains, trashed the table and surrounding area and left no tip.

ADAM HAYES/Collegian

Gore's dismissal of debate rules predicts presidency

EMILY COCHRAN

Al Gore's blatant mockery of the self-imposed rules of the final debate Oct. 17, and his incredulous disregard for narrator Jim Lehrer's numerous attempts to enforce those rules makes one wonder if Gore can't play fairly when he's set the rules, what might we expect from him as a president sworn to uphold the rules of this nation set by our Founding Fathers more than 200 years ago?

Gore's debate etiquette was much like that of a 5-year-old having a temper tantrum. One could only imagine Lehrer saying, "Now Mr. Vice President, stop this behavior or it's time out for you!"

When questioned by CNN's Jonathan Karl after the town-hall style debate regarding Gore's violations of time restraints, follow-up questions to the audience and to George W. Bush, Gore emphatically responded, "There's things more important than rules. It's being elected president of the United States."

This is cause for concern. Al Gore's self-professed disregard for rules is extremely dangerous, especially when one considers the rule of law outlined in the Constitution. No one is above the law, Mr. Vice President, nor the rules.

Speaking of the Constitution, Gore told America in the first debate, "I believe the Constitution ought to be interpreted as a document that grows with ... our country and our history." I suppose, once elected, Gore could rename the Constitution and take credit for writing "The Constitution of the United States of America with Ideological Interpretation by Albert Gore Jr."

The Constitution was chiseled in stone — a written document to ensure the survival of our representative democracy. It is not a living document, as some will argue, subject to revisionary interpretation. Our Founding Fathers outlined in 1787 an amendment process to address possible unforeseen issues. They also established three branches of government (legislative, judicial and executive) to ensure a system of checks and balances so that an above-the-law Hitler, Stalin, Milosevic or the like could never subvert the rules and principles upon which this nation was founded. An elected president is bound by the Constitution and has no power of interpretation no matter what he "believes."

Member of the Continental Congress, Constitutional signer and defender Alexander Hamilton successfully argued that the Constitution was meant to be "unalterable by the government." So much for the living document theory. To even consider granting oneself permission to interpret the Constitution is treading in dangerous waters, and "We the People" better take heed. Our lack of heed already has begun to erode the original intent, when one examines the enormous modern day centralization of the federal government and the loss of jurisdiction intended for local governments.

In addition to his inability to follow rules and his ability to interpret the Constitution, Gore's habitual pattern for falsehood has been easy fodder for comedians, cartoonists, political analysts and voters alike. The only Gore falsehood I would believe is if he told me that Pinocchio was his autobiography ... with a fictional ending. (Pinocchio eventually told the truth).

By consistently reinventing himself to the audience-at-hand, Gore continues to misstate fact even when presidential memos, White House e-mails, NBC footage and so on have him on record and film as saying and doing otherwise. Not only does he fib about himself, but he has the audacity to speak for Bush and displays remarkable mental telepathy, as he clairvoyantly interprets Bush's intentions. Never mind that Bush told NBC's Tim Russert in October that abortion would never be outlawed in a Bush administration. And yet, Gore continues to accuse Bush of intending to overturn Roe vs. Wade.

Gore has taken credit for the Internet, the Strategic Petroleum Reserve and the McCain-Feingold bill for campaign finance reform despite the fact that his 1996 Buddhist temple fund-raising event has led to the indictments of 22 people, 12 convictions, and 70 fifth-amendment pleas to date. Recent information fingers Gore as the man who lied to Congress in 1995, after making a secret agreement with then-Russian Premier Viktor Chernomyrdin that allowed Russia to sell nuclear weapons and technology to Iran, and without US sanctions, on top of that. Never mind that Iran is a country considered by our State Department to be the "the most active state sponsor of terrorism." Gore is still in denial on this one despite recovered, signed classified letters that outline the agreement.

Gore is a serial fibber and does it with his hand in the cereal box. And if this is not enough food for thought, consider his deal-making prowess, which includes involvement with the illegal sales of nuclear technology to Communist China in exchange for off the record campaign donations from Indonesian and Chinese special interests. Consider Justice Department evidence that shows in 1995 Gore asked a Texas tort lawyer for a $100,000 contribution in exchange for a presidential tort reform veto. Money and veto were delivered. Finally, consider an attempt to divert attention from his impending impeachment by President Clinton, with the full support of Gore, the bombing of a pharmaceutical plant in Sudan that killed several innocent civilians, despite U.S. intelligence reports that the plant was not an Osama Bin Laden hideout, as was alleged to the American public.

The end does not justify the means. Rules are important. The Constitution stands as written. Falsehoods are lies. And the selling off of America's soul bit by bit for monetary gain or political diversion is reprehensible. This election is about more than political ideology and party lines. It is about character, honesty and integrity. Gore told us all on national television, "I stand here as my own man. I want you to see me for who I am."

We do, Mr. Vice President. We certainly do.

Dixie Chicks tickets still available for November concert

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

When the clock struck 6 a.m. on Oct. 6, two girls dashed across the parking lot at Bramlage Coliseum to be the first in line to purchase Dixie Chicks concert tickets.

Police officers were monitoring about 500 people who camped out as early as 4 a.m. outside of Bramlage, while several hundred more could be seen waiting for tickets to the Nov. 16 Manhattan show outside of the K-State Student Union.

Looking at those numbers, one might have expected ticket sales to skyrocket, said Jim Muller, associate director of Bramlage.

"That persistent activity may lead people to believe the concert was sold-out, but that's not the case," he said. "The way Bramlage is laid out, we still have several tickets available with great sight-lines."

In fact, although Muller isn't allowed to reveal the number of tickets sold at this point, as the release of that information is the sole privilege of the promoter, MusicCountry.com, he did say there were several thousand tickets remaining.

"I think the way to characterize how we view the ticket situation, as a whole, is that we still have some great tickets remaining," Muller said. "It's an opportunity for those people, who were uncommitted earlier, to still have good seats.

"I think sales will pick up in the next couple of weeks, as people realign their financial situation. This is the hottest group in America today. Even though we have a small market, the possibility of a sell-out is still there."

Muller said the main reason for the sluggish ticket sales points to the fact that the Dixie Chicks have performed recently in the Midwest, as a part of their 70-city Fly Tour.

More specifically, they were at the Kemper Arena in Kansas City, MO.

The Dixie Chicks are scheduled to appear in Denver, the day following their concert in Manhattan.

"Fans had the opportunity to see them in other sites earlier in the fall, and I think people took advantage of that," Muller said. "But I wouldn't say we're disappointed, because sales haven't been what we have expected."

Sarah Dohrmann, sophomore in engineering, said she agreed the Dixie Chicks touring sites hindered ticket sales to a certain degree.

"They've been around this area already," she said. "If people hadn't gone before, then they'd be going now. Besides, there are a lot of people at K-State who are from the Kansas City and Wichita areas."

Muller said the price of the tickets, which is $45.50 plus handling fees, has played a factor in sales.

"People have to understand that they're seeing the same show for the same price across the country," Muller said.

"There's been a change in live music nationally, and people need to get accustomed to that. This is one of the only chances to see the Dixie Chicks in this area for some time to come."

Those chances are few and far between, Muller said, as Dixie Chick Natalie is expecting a child soon, limiting the group's touring opportunities.

Regardless, however, when the Dixie Chicks travel to Manhattan in mid-November, they will bring with them the largest production show in the Little Apple in more than 10 years, Muller said, since the rock-and-roll days of Motley Crue and Def Leppard.

The Dixie Chicks, winners of four CMA awards, will transport 12 semi-trucks full of equipment and eight buses of production crew to Manhattan for the show, Muller said.

But as for the present, tickets might need to increase for the concert in order to ensure that bigger acts will be drawn to the Manhattan community, said Charlie Thomas, director of Bramlage. He said the lack of sales might have a negative effect on future promotions.

"That's always a possibility," Thomas said. "A good sales rep always helps a facility, and a bad rep could potentially hurt it."

Jason Wells delivers a pitch to the plate in the Wildcats' game against Howard University on April 16 at Frank Myers Field. After finishing last season with a 19-32 record, the Wildcats are trying to rebound with one of the toughest schedules in collegiate baseball.

Baseball faces strong schedule

By SAM STIERS
Kansas State Collegian

K-State has decided to take the high road in its quest to rebuild its baseball program.

The Cats will have an uphill battle all season, as they boast one of the strongest schedules in collegiate baseball.

"If it's not the toughest schedule in the country, it's awfully doggone close to it," head coach Mike Clark said. "I think it's a great challenge, but also a great opportunity for our young men."

The schedule for the 2001 season features 10 NCAA Tournament teams, including defending national champion LSU. The 57-game schedule includes 27 games with NCAA regional teams and 17 against teams that finished ranked in the Baseball America Top 25 last year.

K-State finished last season 19-32, and Clark said the best way for the team to improve is to battle against programs that will push the Cats to a higher level of play.

"What we're trying to do is develop our program to where it can compete on a national level, game in and game out, and you don't do that with a weak schedule," he said. "Let's say we're setting our sights a little higher. What it comes down to is, if you play good competition and you beat good competition, you'll be in the top 50, and that is our goal."

Although improving the team is one definite goal for K-State's program, Clark said building up the team's fan base also is a significant priority.

The Cats began play at the newly renovated Frank Myers Field last season, however, it was under construction all year. This season, the stadium should be complete, and Clark said the new arena and a tough schedule against quality opponents should bring more fans to the games.

"The last two years our fans have had to travel and go through some extraordinary things for us to get our facility as good as it is," Clark said. "It's our way of saying that with this new facility we can get good teams in here — for our fans and our players. The more good teams we can get in here, the more it will help our fan base grow.

"This should be an exciting and great chance for our fans to come out and watch us grow and play against some top-25 teams."

In fact, K-State will play home series against Pac-10 powerhouses UCLA and California. They also will lock horns with Maryland, Creighton and Oral Roberts at home, to name a few.

Tough season home games

Mar. 14 – Creighton
Mar. 16-18 – Texas Tech
Apr. 9-10 – Maryland
Apr. 13-15 – Oklahoma
Apr. 20-22 – UCLA
May 1 – Wichita State
May 4 – Kansas
May 11-13 – California

Clark said the non-conference schedule should help K-State prepare for its daunting Big 12 schedule, which includes World Series participant Texas and NCAA participants Baylor, Nebraska, Oklahoma and Texas Tech. The Cats finished 5-24 in conference play last year.

That schedule already has helped the Cats land some top prospects, Clark said, which will help them in the team's hopeful ascension in the Big 12 rankings.

"It's already helped us recruiting wise, because players like to go places where they play good programs," Clark said. "That's one thing we're telling kids, 'You don't have to go south to play good teams. You can stay in Manhattan and play good programs.'

"The good teams are coming to us, and we'll go to them. We'll do everything in our power over the next couple years to play great competition, as we build this program into hopefully a top 25 program."

Golf team 11th in New Mexico

By NICK BRATKOVIC
Kansas State Collegian

"Pretty well" was the recurring phrase for women's golf coach Kristi Knight in describing her team's performance in New Mexico this week.

"In the past, we haven't had a very strong showing at the tournament," Knight said. "It would have been good, if we could have placed in the top nine — that would have been great for this field."

The Cats finished in 11th place at the the 2000 Price's "Give'em Five Fund" Intercollegiate tournament in Las Cruces, and senior Carrie Chambers said the tourney field was a difficult one.

"I think, other than the Big 12 Preview, this was the best field that we have played in this year," she said.

It was a tournament that featured 10 teams ranked in the top-50 poll conducted by Golfweek Magazine. K-State entered the tournament ranked 50th and finished nine strokes ahead of 46th-ranked Colorado State.

Leading the way for the Cats was freshman Christine Boucher, who fired rounds of 76, 75 and 76, giving her a three-round score of 227. Boucher said her putting had improved over past tournaments but that she wasn't pleased with a couple of double bogeys.

"I played pretty good, and I think the team played pretty well," she said. "I was quite happy with my putting."

Boucher's presence on the team has helped give K-State not only a top golfer, but something of a leader.

"She is also really happy go lucky, so that helps to keep things light," sophomore Miranda Smith said.

It was a tournament that K-State's best round came in the second. Chambers said on Monday's day one, the second half of 36 holes is easier because the team has had a chance to warm up.

"The second round is easier, because you have played 18 holes and already seen the pins once," Chambers said. "Well, we didn't have a very good first round, but we had good second round."

The Cats ended Monday in 11th place and that's where they would finish, after shooting a final round of 310. The rounds ensured that K-State would not fire a round of 320 this fall, which Smith said shows progress.

"We didn't shoot a round at 320 all season, and that is exciting," Smith said. "Each day during the season, we would have someone different playing in the first position and leading the way."

The tournament ends the team's fall season, and brings to a close a long season of golf. Smith said it's a good time for a break.

UP NEXT

The Cats will be off until Feb. 23, when they play in the Mountain View Collegiate in Tucson, Ariz.

Major League honors evident through statistics

MIKE VIETTI

We might have just set our clocks back last weekend, always the indicator that everyone's least favorite season has arrived, but that doesn't mean we can't talk about the boys of summer.

I might not be the most qualified individual to dish out awards, but my trouble hitting that trick pitch doesn't mean I can't sway AP voters.

So, with that in mind, here are the deserving recipients for the 2000 Major League Baseball season:

American League MVP: Jason Giambi, 1B, Oakland A's

This race was a squeaker. Giambi's stats, .333 average, 108 runs, 43 homers, 137 RBI, .476 OBP are eerily similar to Toronto's Carlos Delgado, but the A's made the playoffs and the Blue Jays didn't. What about Frank Thomas? Sorry, no DH will ever make my list.

National League MVP: Jeff Kent, 2B, San Francisco Giants

To me, this goes beyond a playoff issue. There isn't a shortage of candidates, but considering Kent plays second base, his hitting stats are phenomenal. This year he batted .334 with 41 doubles, 33 home runs, 125 RBI and had a .424 on-base percentage. Honus Wagner is rolling over in his grave — this easily could be the best offensive performance by a second baseman ever. Plus the Giants made the playoffs, so Kent it is.

American League Cy Young: Pedro Martinez, Boston

A rotting corpse could have figured this one out. Martinez almost single-handily led the Red Sox to the playoffs and I'm thinking that's pretty rare for a pitcher.

His numbers are impressive: 18-6 record, 1.74 ERA, 284 K's, four shutouts, seven complete games, .167 opponents batting average — if I go on, my head will explode. The guy averaged almost 12 strikeouts every nine innings with a K-to-walk ratio approaching nine.

National League Cy Young: Randy Johnson, Arizona

This was a wee bit closer, but not by much. Sure, the Diamondbacks had a disappointing season, but Johnson had no part of it.

He finished 19-7 with a 2.64 ERA, 347 strikeouts, a .224 opponents average and notched 12.56 K's every nine innings. Darryl Kile won 20 games for the Cardinals, after wasting two years of his life in Colorado and Tom Glavine won 21 for the Braves, but Johnson's stats simply are better than the rest.

American League Rookie of the Year: Terrence Long, CF, Oakland

He's not the speediest of center fielders — he only stole five bases all year, but he hit a solid .288 with 80 RBI, 18 homers and 104 runs.

National League Rookie of the Year: Jay Payton, CF, N.Y. Mets

What, no Rafael Furcal? Nope, not around these parts. Furcal's pretty good in the field, but Payton is borderline amazing. Plus, his numbers are similar to Furcal's — .291 average, 63 runs, 60 stolen bases, all from a 28-year-old rookie.

The Cardinals' Rick Ankiel was in contention, with his 11-7 record and 3.50 ERA, but for the first time in my life, I'm basing the decision on what a player did in the playoffs — five wild pitches in one inning for Rick against the Braves. Sorry, but you lost the award because of it.

Tennis to complete fall play at Omaha regionals

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

K-State will conclude the 2000 fall season Nov. 5 at the Intercollegiate Tennis Association Regional Championships in Omaha, Neb.

In the 64-player main singles draw, sophomore Petra Sedlmajerova is the No. 1 seed, while junior Alena Jecminkova drew No. 4.

"It's nice to have several players seeded," head coach Steve Bietau said. "However, we have to defend our seeds on the court. We certainly want every individual to do as well as she possibly can in this tournament, but we are also thinking about the spring season and how we look as a team.

"It will be a better indicator of team strength, if the whole team does well."

Senior Eva Novotna' and junior Kathy Chuda also are entered in the singles draw, and each of the four Wildcats will compete in one round of singles today.

In addition, the 48-team doubles draw pairs Novotna' and Sedlmajerova as the No. 2 seed, while the Jecminkova/Chuda duo sits as No. 6.

Freshman Paulina Castillejos is the lone Wildcat competing in the qualifying rounds, and she also teams up with Natalia Boyko in doubles action.

"Practice has gone quite well the past couple of weeks," Bietau said. "I think we've made definite progress since our last tournament, and we are playing better."

chili CHALLENGE

STORY BY JJ DUNCAN

Popular dish spurs variations, competitions

Whether feeding cowboys on the trail, families on a cold day or even hungry restaurant patrons, chili is an American food with a following as strong as its taste.

Joan Stiles, office manager for the International Chili Society, said the ICS sponsors around 300 chili cook-offs each year throughout the United States and other countries. The events are sanctioned by the ICS, which means it is important for the judging to be regulated because the events are so competitive.

"All of the judging is done anonymously with numbered bowls, so the judges don't know whose chili they are tasting," she said. "There are judging sheets where the judges mark what is good and bad about the chili and make comments."

Each judge is allowed a maximum of 25 bowls to taste from with a chance to clean the palette between each tasting, Stiles said.

Judges look at things such as the texture of the meat and how well the spices are cooked into the chili. When it comes down to the finals, she said the judges are told to choose the chili they could eat every day for the rest of their lives if they had to.

Considering the highly competitive nature of the cook-offs, the entrants get along surprisingly well, Stiles said.

"The camaraderie among the chili cooks is amazing to see," she said. "Even though they all want to win, they get along really well. When they get together it looks like a family reunion."

John Heritage, owner of Texas Star Cafe and Hibachi Hut, said cooking chili has become a hobby for him, even though he has only competed in smaller events including the former Aggieville Chili Cook-Off.

Heritage said there are many different kinds of chili, but he specializes in four.

In competitions, beans aren't allowed in red chili because original Texas Chili didn't have them, so Heritage has the XXX Chili, which meets competition regulations.

Next is the homestyle chili, which has beans for those who enjoy that taste. There also is chili verde, a New Mexican-style using green chili peppers, pork and a white chili, which is literally white with chicken, white beans and sour cream.

Texas Star Cafe soon will have sampler platters with all four types of chili, so those who don't know what kind of chili they like can find one that suits their tastes, Heritage said.

Though there are many types of chili, he said there also is an array of styles within red chili. This is because chili allows for such a broad spectrum of ingredients and is subject to the cook's taste.

"Everyone has their own chili recipe, and it's because chili lets you be creative," he said. "There's not really a right and wrong way of making your chili. A lot of people like to cook it because it's hard to screw up."

Chili has a reputation for being a spicy food, but there are many who enjoy a more mild chili, so Heritage said he cooks for those who like it less spicy, but keeps spices on the tables for those who like it hot.

This same idea permeates competitions as well, since it is usually the less spicy chili that win the competitions, Stiles said.

Spiciness is only one consideration when personalizing a recipe. The aspect of making a recipe to reflect the cook's taste is part of what makes chili such a popular dish to prepare, said Nathan Nely, line cook at Hibachi Hut.

He said chili is appealing to people lately, because of the colder weather.

"Chili is popular because it's warm, it's quick and you can store it a long time," he said. "A lot of people cook it around this time of year for the colder seasons."

To develop a palette for chili tasting, Heritage said people should attend chili cook-offs whenever possible. This also will help them learn how to make a good chili because there are many recipes to choose from.

Cooks at the competitions often are more than willing to share tips and discuss recipes with those interested, Stiles said. It is important to remember that even the world championship recipes are subject to personal taste and are different from each other, she said.

"Chili is as individual as the cooks who make it," she said. "No two bowls are alike, even from the same recipe."

Heritage said he recommends leaving the decisions of taste up to the mouth.

"When tasting a chili, there are things you can look at to decide how well it was cooked," he said. "But still, when you eat a really good chili, you just know it."

candidate completely."

Procter said most large official campaigns incorporate both positive and negative advertising, but all of their advertisements are issue-oriented.

"Political-interest groups tend to run attack ads," Procter said.

"They are allowed to do so, as long as they do not come out and say to vote for one candidate or the other."

Schenck-Hamlin said people should invest time in researching candidates in order to have a clear idea of the actual issues of the race.

"The attack ads assume that people cannot make up their minds for themselves," he said. "In order to keep a firm grasp on what is actually going on, one should pay attention to the candidates early into the race to avoid being influenced by attack ads."

Elaine Gruenbacher, senior in secondary education, said she keeps up with the issues of a race and tries to ignore all the negative advertisements.

"In my opinion, all the negative attacks are a waste of a candidate's time and money," Gruenbacher said. "I am interested in what the candidates have to say and try to get the real story."

Schenck-Hamlin said the important thing to keep in mind is the issues and to avoid attack advertisements.

"Attack ads produce nothing but cynicism among the voters," he said. "Voters need to keep in mind what is important during an election and try not to be swayed by attack ads

Many hair styles of African-American women have the similar shape of an African woman's head wrap. Hats, elaborate in design, are also important to African-American dress.

"African-American women still wear hats. All you have to do is go to any church on Sunday morning and you'll find them," O'Neal said.

The final dimension is "dressing up." O'Neal used K-State as a comparison for this dimension.

"If you go to a historically black school, where football is important, it will look like a fashion show," she said. "Unlike K-State, where everyone has on purple. Dressing up is so important."

O'Neal said African dress has influenced fashion in many ways.

"Earrings all around," she said. "That's definitely not European."

As for baggy pants, O'Neal said they were stylized by African dress.

"Even before they were stylized and dropped on the hips, the African-American men didn't like tight things," she said.

This dislike for tighter clothing is apparent in African clothes, which tend to be big and loose.

"Now, next time you see my brother striving in rhythm," O'Neal said. "It isn't deviance — it's simply different."

LaTrice Moore, senior in apparel and textile marketing, attended the presentation with a friend.

"It was wonderful," she said. "Some of the stuff she talked about we didn't know, even with us being African-American."

David Williams, graduate student in college student personnel, said he went to the presentation to take advantage of the opportunity and to learn about a different culture.

"Sometimes clothes feel a little bit intimidating, for example baggy pants," he said. "It's nice to hear that there is some cultural history behind it."

"Something revenue-generating is good for students because it takes less from student fees," he said.

The Multicultural Student Organization moved into its current location, behind the computer store on the first floor of the Union, this fall, and Worcester said KSDB-FM 91.9 could possibly expand its facilities by moving into the office.

Greek Affairs operates in Holton Hall, and Greek Affairs Adviser Barb Robel said the university will decide what to do with the extra space if the activities center is built.

Student Governing Association's current office in the Union's Office of Student Activities and Services would become part of the proposed center, so there would not be free space for other activities.

Although all of SGA's current space will be utilized by the center in some way, how the space will be distributed will be determined in the future, Worcester said.

"It's a lot cheaper to reorganize than build new space," he said. "Every organization would be better in terms of space and resources."

Residence hall drug arrests up since 1998

By NANCY FOSTER
Kansas State Collegian

Arrests for drug use in the residence halls increased by more than 360 percent in one year, according to campus statistics.

In 1998, three drug violations were reported to K-State Police, while 14 cases were reported in 1999.

Scott Jones, assistant dean of student life, said the increase might be due to having a watchful staff.

"It could be because we're doing a better job of policing," he said." Or more people are deciding to partake in drugs."

The exact reason why, he said, would be hard to say.

In 1998, the Riley County Police Department arrested three people in the residence halls for drug abuse. In 1999, the number rose to 14. While it might seem like a large increase, other universities in the Big 12 have experienced large increases, as well.

The statistics, reported every calendar year, showed that the University of Colorado experienced a 300-percent increase — four violations in 1998 and 16 in 1999. Baylor University reported zero violations in 1998, and seven in 1999.

"Other campuses are showing increases in drug violations, as well," Jones said. "I'm not sure why this is, but it shows to be a national trend."

Eric Mabie, resident assistant in Moore Hall, said drug abuse in Moore wasn't a problem.

"I think every hall has their one or two, but we haven't seen hardly any," Mabie said. "Our hall's not one of the big ones for that."

When there is speculation of drug use within the residence halls, the disciplinary action is not handled by the hall.

"Drugs we don't deal with at all," Mabie said. "If there's the smallest inclination, we call the police."

Derek Jackson, assistant director of the Department of Housing and Dining Services, said thus far in 2000, he hadn't noticed any unusual trends in the number of violations.

"It's not been abnormal," Jackson said.

As far as alcohol violations, K-State's number was relatively low compared to other Big 12 schools. One arrest was made in 1999 for violating the liquor law. Texas Tech University experienced the greatest number of arrests, reporting 60 alcohol violations. The University of Colorado was second with 53 arrests for alcohol violations.

When alcohol is found within the residence hall, disciplinary action usually is handled through the hall. This is done by a group of peers that forms a judiciary board, and the action they decide to take varies upon the case.

"It can range from expulsion from the hall, all the way down to probation," Mabie said.

Most of the violations reported are due to minors having possession of alcohol, Jones said.

"Our year has been slower than previous years as far as judicial action," Jackson said.

Anyone under the age of 21 is not allowed to have alcohol. Those who are 21 or older living in the residence halls are allow[illegible] have one case of 3.2 beer in their possession, and no hard alcohol.

Jones said that while the drug and alcohol violations are not a problem, they are a concern.

"It's one of many concerns we have to deal with. The use of alcohol and drugs has always been a concern with the university," he said. "They don't have a place in our living communities."

Car bomb fuels fire in Israel

By GREG MYRE
The Associated Press

JERUSALEM — A car bomb killed two Israelis near a crowded Jerusalem market Thursday, escalating tensions as Israeli and Palestinian leaders put off a truce announcement meant to end five weeks of fighting.

Islamic militants claimed responsibility for the blast, which killed the daughter of a right-wing Israeli political leader. Elsewhere, Palestinian areas were again aflame, with two Palestinians killed and at least 80 injured in the West Bank, doctors and rescue workers said.

The violence endangered — and might have scuttled — the latest in a series of cease-fire agreements.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak and Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat initially planned to simultaneously declare a truce at 2 p.m. The announcements were delayed with the expectation they would come a few hours later.

But shortly after 3 p.m., a Mazda car loaded with explosives detonated on a narrow residential street less than 200 yards from the congested Mahane Yehuda market.

Flames leaped high into the air, sending up huge black plumes of black smoke as wailing ambulances converged on the working-class area lined with old stone apartment buildings. Eleven people — including four children — were slightly injured in addition to the two killed.

Police identified the dead as Hanan Levy, 32, and Ayelet Hashahar-Levy, 24. They were not related.

Ayelet Hashahar-Levy was the daughter of Yitzhak Levy, leader of the National Religious Party. Yitzhak Levy has served as a minister in several Israeli governments. He left his post in Barak's government because of disagreements over the peace process.

Israel said it was standing by the truce reached Wednesday night in a meeting between Arafat and Israeli elder statesman Shimon Peres.

An open house Thursday in the K-State Student Union introduced two possible forms of student transportation.

One form would serve Manhattan through a two- or three-route community busing system. The other form introduced was a campus parking shuttle, which would operate only on campus.

TranSystems Corp. was hired to research transportation in Manhattan. The consulting firm has conducted feasibility studies, surveys and organized focus groups. The Kansas Department of Transportation funded 80 percent of the study, and 20 percent was funded by the city and university.

The two-route community system and campus shuttle plan were presented at the open house. Angie Siefkes, TranSystems' engineer and planner, said research results were preliminary and need community recommendations.

The proposal estimates that the community system might cost $918,500 annually. This cost would be split between the university and the city. Students would have to pay $23 each year.

A campus shuttle, which was first proposed by the Student Governing Association last January, might cost students $455,000 per year. User fees would be assessed for the service.

Don Slater, 61-year Manhattan resident, said he thought the community-wide proposal was a wonderful idea. He said senior citizens, those who can't drive and students all would benefit.

Guy Lindblom, senior in civil engineering, said a city system would not be used enough to be properly funded. He said Manhattan is too small to support the system.

"I'm interested in the campus parking shuttle, although I think it's a lot of money per student," he said.

Dave Kephart, junior in finance and pre-law, said the student cost for either system is minimal.

Students encouraged to begin seeking internships for summer early

By NANCY FOSTER
Kansas State Collegian

While summer might seem far off, some companies have already begun the search for summer interns. Acquiring one of these internships might be as easy as asking family and friends.

"I think that's what most summer jobs come from," said Marcia Schuley, associate director of Career and Employment Services.

She said about 80 percent of jobs come from networking or using connections. It's what she called the hidden market — jobs that aren't advertised but can be obtained.

"Maybe a firm hasn't listed an opening, but you know someone that works there," Schuley said.

She said now is the prime time to begin networking and using connections.

"Now is the season to be doing that," she said. "You can make some connections over the Thanksgiving and Christmas holiday."

The other kind of market — the visible market — are those jobs that are listed in print, on Web sites or advertised at an event, such as a job fair.

"Critical to finding an internship involves the visible and hidden market," Schuley said.

She said there are several important things to remember when looking for an internship.

"The key is you've got to be willing to talk about yourself and to do some research on the company," Schuley said.

Knowing information about the company or business will help get the job, she said. When applying, one also needs to have a résumé and cover letter. Depending on the field, a portfolio might be necessary as well.

Career and Employment Services is sponsoring two different workshops in the month of November. On Nov. 7, it is conducting a résumé workshop, and on Nov. 9, a drop-in résumé critique. Schuley said people still can make appointments and have résumés critiqued if they cannot attend the workshops. Cover letters can also be critiqued.

Those in need of information can look at the Career and Employment Services Web site, Schuley said, at www.ksu.edu/ces.

"Our Web site is sort of designed from A to Z in helping you with your résumé and cover letter and guiding you to some sites that might be useful," she said.

Andy Macklin, secretary at the Office of Student Activities and Services, said involvement always looks good on a résumé.

"Any activity where you can not only say you were a member but list something you did ,is good," Macklin said. "Any time you can show substance to something you've been involved in, it helps validate it."

While you can choose to flip burgers for the summer, Schuley said unless it's related to one's degree, building experience for the résumé is a better idea.

"Just look around and see what's around you," she said. "Do something where you see your professional models working around you."

After working in that field, you might decide it's not actually for you, Schuley said.

"But you won't know that until you get out there and experience that," she said.

The prime time for internship availability is in February, she said, but it's never too early to begin looking. Sophomores should really consider finding an internship, but once again, it's never too early to start, she said.

"If they start early, they are so much more likely to get better jobs," Schuley said. "They come out with better jobs, better pay because they've had more experience."

Waters Hall conference room redone, dedicated

Students in the Department of Interior Design joined with the Department of Agricultural Economics to build a new conference room over the summer.

The conference room, in Waters Hall, was renovated after student teams in interior design worked on plans to redesign the room, said Dan Bernardo, head of the Department of Agricultural Economics.

"It was a venture between two departments that do not normally interact to work together," Bernardo said.

The conference room was dedicated Thursday afternoon. Bernardo said the students in interior design formed teams in order to design the room, and the team responsible for the design was awarded $100.

"The students did a great project and incorporated a lot of things into the plan," Bernardo said. "I think all the students and professors involved in the project enjoyed it a lot."

Bernardo said the room, which was once an office, received new furniture, a new ceiling and lighting.

Bush admits DUI arrest after reports surface

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Texas Gov. George W. Bush pleaded guilty nearly 25 years ago to driving while under the influence of alcohol, his presidential campaign said Thursday after news organizations received copies of the 1976 police report.

"It's not something he's proud of," spokeswoman Mindy Tucker said, explaining why Bush had not come forward with the information on his own.

Bush was pulled over by police for driving too slowly near his family's Kennebunkport, Maine, summer home during the Labor Day weekend. Other people were in the car, but Tucker did not know who.

Tucker said Bush paid a $150 fine and had his driving privileges revoked in the state of Maine for a short period. His driver's license in Texas, where Bush lived at the time, was not revoked or suspended, she said.

The GOP presidential nominee has said he quit drinking the day after his 40th birthday — July 6, 1986. Alcohol "was beginning to compete for my affections," he told an interviewer in September.

Campaign officials said Bush was detained by police, though they did not know for how long, and said he posted a $500 bond. They said Bush decided to release details of the incident after the police report was faxed to Maine news outlets.

Students, families file claim against officials

ALTAMONT, Kan. — The families of five Labette County High School students, accused last year of plotting an attack on their high school but later cleared when their accuser recanted, have filed claims totaling $50 million against the officials involved in the investigation.

The students' filed notices on Wednesday of claims for $10 million for each of the five.

The claims were filed with the city of Altamont, Labette County, the local school district and officials at those agencies.

The students were arrested and charged in December 1999 with conspiracy to commit first-degree murder after a classmate told officials about the alleged plot. They spent about two months in custody before the classmate recanted.

The charges were dropped in April, and the classmate was charged with falsely reporting a crime. The five were barred from the school for the rest of the academic year even after the charges were dropped.

K-State professors to teach in Czech Republic

By NANCY HULL
Kansas State Collegian

Anthropology professor Harriet Ottenheimer hopes to strengthen a K-State course by introducing it to Prague's Charles University next semester.

Ottenheimer said questions that Prague students raise in her Creativity and Culture course will give her new perspectives on the class.

"They come from different backgrounds and cultures than students here, so they'll question different things," Ottenheimer said. "When students question you, you question the material and find better ways to present it."

Charles University does not now have a course about anthropology and the arts. Creativity and Culture offers a cross-cultural survey of the verbal, visual and performing arts. Ottenheimer said the course will be an important addition to the courses offered at Charles.

"To ignore how anthropology looks at art is to ignore a large part that makes us human," she said. "We think it's something extra, but it's all around us. Listening to music and decorating apartments all deals with the arts."

Ottenheimer said she will have to adjust the way she presents course information at the Czech university. She now uses PowerPoint slides, but she'll have to use overhead projectors next semester. Prague students tend to rely more on lectures instead of reading and discussing, and there usually are no exams until the end of the semester.

"Part of the challenge will be to lecture more and try to draw students into readings and discussions," Ottenheimer said.

Accompanying Ottenheimer next semester will be her husband, Martin Ottenheimer. He is also a professor of anthropology and will teach Religion in Culture at the university.

Language differences and adjusting to students from a different background are things Martin Ottenheimer said will be challenges next semester. He said he expects the Czech students to be less religious than students here.

"They just don't have the same background in the subject," Martin Ottenheimer said. "But anthropology is about being good at adapting to new situations."

Martin Ottenheimer is in phase retirement and said now is a good opportunity for this cultural experience.

"This is a wonderful opportunity to learn, as well as teach in a way different part of the world," he said. "I'll have the opportunity to have a major impact in a country."

The Ottenheimers were invited to teach in Prague by a former student who is now an ethnology instructor at Charles. This student was one of the first Czech students to take part in an exchange program between K-State and Charles in the early 1990s.

The offer to teach in Prague came when Harriet Ottenheimer had a 2-day visit in the city a few years ago.

"I was honored that this student thought I taught well enough to contribute there," she said.

Harriet Ottenheimer said she enjoyed her short visit to the city and looks forward to returning.

MICHAEL YOUNG/Collegian

Harriet Ottenheimer, professor of anthropology, will be traveling to Prague next semester to teach at Charles University. Her husband, Martin Ottenheimer, will also travel with her, teaching Religion in Culture there.

"The food, music and architecture are all attractions. It a real lively, old European city," she said.

A grant Harriet Ottenheimer received from the J. William Fulbright international educational exchange program will help the Ottenheimers afford to teach in Prague. Recipients are selected on the basis of academic or professional achievement and for demonstrating unusual leadership potential in their fields.

Muriel Joffe, senior program officer for the scholarship board, said an important part of the selection process is looking at the proportional benefit for both universities involved.

"Our purpose is to foster mutual understanding within our 125 programs," Joffe said. "We had to consider not only what she could give to Charles, but also what she could bring back from the grant."

Both Ottenheimers will serve as curriculum consultants in the Department of Ethnology next semester, and Harriet Ottenheimer said she hopes to expand their department to include parts of the four fields of American anthropology.

"There's been lots of students involved in the exchange between the two universities, and I'm hoping to open up the faculty exchange more," she said. "By knowing people at both universities and letting faculty know what's involved in the exchange, things can improve at both ends."

Astronaut, cosmonauts move into new space station

By MARCIA DUNN
The Associated Press

KOROLYOV, Russia — One American astronaut and two Russian cosmonauts moved into the international space station Thursday, swinging open the doors, flipping on the lights and making the ship come alive for years and possibly decades to come.

"It's a great moment for all of us," said the space station's commander, U.S. astronaut Bill Shepherd.

He and his crewmates, Yuri Gidzenko and Sergei Krikalev, temporarily christened their ship Alpha — after getting permission.

"The first expedition on the space station requests permission to take the radio call sign Alpha," Shepherd called down to Daniel Goldin, head of the U.S. space agency NASA.

The crew put their right hands on top of one another as a show of unity to Goldin and the hundreds of others watching from Russian Mission Control outside Moscow. They had been pushing for a name for years, with Alpha at the top of the list.

Goldin, no fan of Alpha or any other name except international space station, was taken aback. But he laughed and told the men to go ahead and call the space station Alpha for their four-month mission.

The president of spacecraft builder Energia, Yuri Semyonov, said he disliked the name Alpha because it implies first and Russia's space station Mir was around long before.

Semyonov suggested Beta as a name, or Mir 2.

The three men arrived aboard a Russian Soyuz capsule Thursday and docked smoothly with the station as the two craft zoomed 240 miles above Kazakhstan.

Russian Mission Control erupted in applause when contact was confirmed and again a few hours later, when the trio appeared on giant video screens.

"Let's look upon this as the real opening of the international space frontier," Goldin said. He called it a stepping stone to Mars and the rest of the solar system.

Shepherd said: "We're just starting a long journey."

Krikalev noted the years of delay in building the space station. "Now we are finally on the station ready to take care of it," he said.

Because of limited communication between the space station and Russian Mission Control, there was no immediate word on which systems had been activated by the crew. Among the top priorities: getting the toilet working.

Flight controllers hope to keep the crew's work schedule light the first few weeks, although Krikalev, the crew's veteran with 484 days in space on four previous missions, has battery repairs on tap for Friday.

NASA expects it will take a while before Shepherd, Gidzenko and Krikalev feel truly at home. They'll be confined to two of the space station's three rooms until space shuttle Endeavor arrives in early December with giant solar panels for power.

Until Thursday's docking, Russia's superstitious space officials were hesitant to boast and left it to their NASA counterparts to talk the space station up. Semyonov kept knocking on wooden tables every time he mentioned the linkup, until it actually happened.

"It's a historical, remarkable day," he said. "For the first time, countries have joined, have pooled their intellects, to create the international space station."

Senate passes funding

By BRYAN SCRIBNER
Kansas State Collegian

A bill that will help fund under-represented groups on campus was passed by Student Senate on Thursday night.

The Educational Opportunity Fund allocated $247,593 to 22 campus organizations. Funding was received for scholarships, salaries, graduate teaching positions and disabled student groups.

Privilege fees support the fund, which was established in 1988 by the Kansas Board of Regents.

Student Body Vice President Dana Pracht said 27 proposals were discussed individually. She said limited funding existed for these groups, and allocation guidelines set by the board were followed by the Educational Opportunity Fund Committee.

The guidelines specify the fund transfers money for academic scholarships, fellowships or grants.

"The programs that we are funding are incredible," Pracht said. "We should be proud that we are responsible for some of their success."

A resolution asking for Senate support for a mandatory tuberculosis prevention program was also introduced at the meeting. The mandatory testing policy would require students who have visited or resided in countries at risk for the disease be tested.

Only 27 countries are not at risk for tuberculosis. About 950 K-State students are from high-risk countries. Students who have spent more than four months in one of these countries would have to be tested before they are allowed to enroll.

The policy might be adopted by administrators in January. Dustin Petrik, student representative of the communicable disease committee, said the legislation is seeking student support before the policy reaches administrators.

Mayor's dinner chance to give to unfortunate

There is something you can do to help end hunger. Mayor Karen McCulloh is will be host to the annual Mayor's Hunger Experience Dinner on Sunday in the K-State Student Union Main Ballroom.

The $15 dinner will benefit the Flint Hills Breadbasket.

Part of the dinner experience has to deal with random selection. It is random because some of the diners will be served a multi-course meal that is a representation of the middle class.

Others, who represent the moderate, will receive a meal that is in the middle in terms of the amount and quality of the food.

Those, who represent the less fortunate, will receive a minimal meal.

This is a creative, effective way for everyone to see first-hand not everyone understands the concept of a multiple serving meal. It brings attention to the fact that some people go hungry.

Along with the meal, live entertainment will be showcased at the dinner.

Whatever the point behind the meal, the donations to the breadbasket have been outstanding.

Contact Shirley Bramhall, executive director of the Flint Hills Breadbasket, by 5 p.m. today at 537-0730 to reserve your tickets. As their slogan states, "Because No One Should Go Hungry.

Space CRUNCH

Few will benefit from addition due to lack of space

JOSEPH HURLA

Halloween has come and gone, yet proponents of a student activities center continue to disguise the center as a worthwhile venture.

The monster behind the mask, however, is a Student Activities Center that will benefit few students while costing everyone immensely.

The organizations that would benefit most would be the Student Governing Association, Greek Affairs, Multicultural Affairs and Union Programming Council. Each of these groups supports the addition because it will provide them with a more spacious office in the K-State Student Union.

Few others would benefit.

Yes, the center will include about 120 cubicle spaces for other student groups, but a cubicle is hardly the sort of space most of these groups require. Additionally, there are 330 student organizations registered with the Office of Student Activities and Services. All of these groups will be vying for those 120 cubicle spaces, leaving nearly two-thirds without even a scrap from the table.

But the center's four cornerstone organizations are running the table.

And they have the deck stacked in their favor.

SGA's Governmental Affairs Committee decided to open only one polling location for Thursday's student referendum on the issue. This location will be in the Union, where voter turnout should be predominantly greek.

Coincidentally, both the Interfraternity and the Panhellenic councils voted unanimously to formally support the construction of the student activity center.

This, however, should come as no surprise. Greek Affairs and SGA both stand to reap handsome rewards once construction is complete.

Everyone else is left to pay the costs.

And those costs are immense.

The Student Governing Association is asking students to decide if they will provide about $1.8 million in privilege fees over the next 15 years to fund the addition to the east side of the Union. This means students would cough up an additional $6.50 per semester — or about $50 during a four-year stint at K-State — to fund the center.

The remainder of the funding would come from a privilege fee surplus of about $750,000 and about $2.1 million in excess university funds. Although this money already does exist, it is important to note the source of the revenue: students.

You and I actually are paying this additional $3 million.

The money for both funds comes from students as the result of increased enrollment. When enrollment rises, revenue surpluses are placed into accounts for future use.

The future is now for our money.

The money will be thrown away to support an activities center that is a waste of time, space and effort.

Although this money has come from student fees during the course of the past few years, proponents of the center neglect to mention this $3 million as student funding. The reality is that students are paying for the entire center while more worthwhile endeavors, i.e. Hale Library, a parking solution and more money for better teachers, continue to cause students headaches.

Rather than curing these headaches, our millions of dollars will go to creating a new one. We will shell out $50 to give SGA, Greek Affairs, Multicultural Affairs and UPC more comfortable offices.

SGA is counting on students' apathy to approve this fee increase. Voting has been limited to the Union, where only those who stand to benefit the most will take the time to vote.

The Nov. 9 referendum will require 60 percent approval in order for the fee increase to go into effect. Those cornerstone groups are crossing their fingers, hoping only their members will take the time to vote.

They know the mask they have pulled over the student activities center is a poor one.

They know many students can see what is behind that mask.

But they are hoping students won't bother to call them on it.

So it is up to students to prove that they're not fooled by thin disguises.

It is up to them to use their "no" vote to reveal the student activities center for the sham that it is.

Fourum caller erroneous in assumption that all GTAs receive full tuition waivers

Editor,

This is in response to the ignoble undergraduate who claimed in Tuesday's Campus Fourum that all graduate teaching assistants who are "full time" get full tuition waivers. If we are getting such a great deal, as this dubious caller claims, why isn't everyone going to graduate school? Granted, some GTAs and resident assistants do get a tuition waiver (I have in the past), but it is hardly all of us. In fact, I would hazard a guess that it is less than 50 percent here at K-State, and that K-State still would fall behind the rest of the Big 12 in this category.

Take a look around campus. Have you noticed that most GTAs are not from the United States? This choice usually is not based on academic qualifications, but on an individual's economic reality. Faced with student loans close to six figures, the idea of being paid so little that one qualifies for food stamps, while increasing this debt even further and working upwards of 80 hours a week, most U.S. students decide against perusing further study.

Let's see, I can choose between $60-100,000 as a regional sales rep for a pharmaceutical company with my biology/chemistry degree, or I can bust my butt and maybe publish a few papers, go further into debt and make about the same as an instructor/professor or research scientist— tough choice.

In no way am I claiming that only U.S. citizens should attend Graduate School, just that this should emphasize the point that Graduate School is an arduous undertaking — not some free ride to easy street. Individuals without as many choices as your average American seem to be taking on this task more often than their American peers.

Believe it or not, graduate students (and their professors) bring in millions of dollars to this university every year —far more than all the athletic programs combined. I'm not asking for sympathy just because I chose to attend Graduate School; however, I would like a little respect for my efforts.

I just hope this faceless wonder puts in more effort on his/her next exam than he or she did on this misinformed call.

Thanks for your time.

Tips, tricks available to save cash

ERIN SCHNEWEIS

College students are broke; however, there are things that college students can do to save some money.

For instance:

— For those of you who are sinking in credit card debt, there is something that can be done. Call your credit card company to see if you can get your interest rate reduced. One of my friends ended up reducing their rate in half in a less-than-five-minute phone call.

— Buy a Sunday edition of the Kansas City Star for $1.50 and you can save at least $10 in coupons.

— Unhook your long distance from your telephone. Consider using a calling card instead.

— Get a cellular phone. Keep an eye on your minutes and you usually will wind up with a good deal.

— If your cell phone plan offers you free voice mail, be wary. Usually, the service itself is free, but when you check your voice messages, they take away your minutes. You can check the messages from a land-based phone.

— Drink at home before going to Aggieville.

— When you do depart your house, take only $10. For some reason, intoxication sometimes makes people think they have more money than they do.

— When you go out, find something on special at the restaurant or bar. A lot of places have cheap food during the week.

— Try cooking in bulk at home.

— Have a potluck dinner and invite your friends. You will only have to make one item, but you will have plenty to eat.

— If you live close to campus, walk or ride a bike to class.

— Don't buy ICAT. You will be paying for a seat that you probably won't have.

— Donate plasma.

— Don't buy your plane tickets around peak times.

— Only buy clothes that are on sale, not necessarily for sale. Check the shopping centers and malls frequently to find out the best deals.

— Get a second opinion from the head of the department before you enroll, take any classes over, etc. This could save you time and money.

— Buy home furnishings from a yard sale or an auction.

— Ask hotels for good rates.

— Question your phone bill. Refuse to pay for calls that are not yours.

— Discuss issues with someone when you know that you are right. Try to remain calm and stand your ground.

— If you see an advertisement in the newspaper for an item in a store and they are out, get a rain check.

— The next time you purchase something that isn't what you thought or is defective, return it immediately.

— Buy books from the clearance racks or from thrift stores.

— Look at name-brand household items and compare the quality of generic brands.

— For the next Homecoming, camp outside of the greek houses. You won't have to buy toilet paper for a year — you just may have to take out some of the branches and twigs.

— When you call your parents, if they have caller ID let it ring once. They can call you back, because they probably have more money to shell out for the phone bill.

— Don't buy a CD for one or two songs. Can we say Napster?

— If you get your car repaired and it isn't fixed and you paid for it, let your mechanic know. If you insist on quality service, then you will get it. This is from first-hand experience.

— Remember, it pays to be nice. This will not only make the world a better place (sigh), but you also can benefit from it. I have received tickets to movies, theater productions, hockey games, robes, flowers, candy and samples galore just from being nice.

— Don't be too cheap. No one likes to be around someone who pulls out the calculator after a dinner with friends. Just watch your budget in appropriate times.

Student center discussed at forum

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

If students are willing to buy a burger and a beer in Aggieville, they should be willing to spend just as much money, $6.50, once a semester to purchase a 16,000-square-foot student activities center.

That was the message delivered by Student Body President Jake Worcester and Vice President Dana Pracht on Thursday afternoon in a forum in the K-State Student Union.

That money would add up to $1.8 million over 15 years and would provide the nearly 350 student organizations with increased access to campus services including storage, equipment, conference, workrooms and professional advisers.

The main obstacle opposing the center is the increase in student privilege fees, the same issue that caused students to vote not to support the football stadium expansion two years ago. Pracht said she remains optimistic, however, that students will vote for this fee increase.

"I think that this is a student-run campaign, that we as students are informing other students and getting them excited about it," she said. "I think that students respect the fact that it's students who are bringing up this issue, not the administration."

If the Nov. 9 referendum receives the necessary 60 percent favorable vote required, the most important goal for the center would not deal in equipment, Worcester said. Just like the beer that students buy in Aggieville, a new activities center could increase communication and teamwork among diverse groups.

"I think there are organizations out there that put forth a lot of initiative and really go to lot of hard work to team up with other organizations, but I think that a lot that happens within the groups that they are in," Worcester said. "You see a lot of multicultural student organizations partnered together to do some events on campus. You see fraternities and sororities partnered together for philanthropies and other events.

"What I want to see is us break down those barriers and work across those lines, work on some new things — really work across colleges, across departments, and across the ideological boundaries that currently exist. I think that if we can do that, I think we'll really see an increase and an improvement in the way we do those things."

To achieve such intra-organizational cooperation, four organizations that are housed separately, Student Governing Association, Multicultural Student Organizations, Union Program Council and Greek Affairs all would move their offices to the addition, and those four groups would be joined by other student groups as space is available.

A similar setup is used at the University of Illinois activities center, and the result is exactly what K-State is looking to achieve, Worcester said.

"At Illinois, I was really amazed when I walked into their Student Activities Center in the middle of the day, and it was busy and it was crazy, and there were people in there yelling across the room, and they were working on projects together and they were having a great time," he said. "They said that there was no way that we could do what we do without a student activities center."

Murder suspect fights extradition

The Associated Press

SEATTLE — A man charged with murder in his girlfriend's death is fighting authorities' efforts to return him to Kansas for trial. Steven Papen, 37, of Wichita refused to waive extradition at a Thursday hearing in the King County Jail. An extradition hearing has been scheduled for Nov. 29.

Dan Donohoe, a spokesman for the King County prosecutor's office, said he sees no legal barriers to returning Papen to Kansas. He said Papen could be returned to Kansas before Nov. 29 if the proper paperwork is completed and an extradition warrant granted.

Papen is charged with first-degree murder in the death of Dana Anderson on Aug. 18, his 37th birthday. Anderson's 12-year-old son reportedly came home and found blood throughout the house and his mother missing.

The couple were last seen together Aug. 10 in Wichita, where they had shared a home for two years.

On Aug. 15, Papen was found unconscious on the beach at Seattle's Discovery Park. He was in a coma for nearly a month. Relatives have said he had no connection to the Seattle area.

Two days later, Anderson's body was found in her car at a Colorado airport. An autopsy showed she had been strangled and struck on the head with a blunt object.

Wildcats prepare for Big 12 road game

■ Volleyball squad looks to get ahead in beginning against Texas Longhorns.

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

Road games haven't been kind to K-State's volleyball team.

In Big 12 play, the Cats have gone 2-4 at opposing team's arenas, and now they must travel to Austin, Texas, to face the Longhorns on Saturday.

Despite the Cats' recent successes, or lack thereof, on the road, head coach Jim McLaughlin said the team needs to focus more on itself than on the opponent.

"I think more than anything, if we pass the ball and stay in a good rhythm, then I think we play the game a little bit better than they do," McLaughlin said. "I'm more concerned with us just passing the ball, getting in a good rhythm and hitting the ball for good numbers than I am worried about those guys."

One area of concern for the Cats is their tendency to start games slowly. In K-State's last two matches against Texas Tech and Baylor, the opposing team has jumped out to early leads, forcing the Cats to battle back. They were able to do so, but constantly falling behind can have consequences, as K-State dropped a five-game match to the Bears.

To avoid a road-loss repeat, the Cats need to play with intensity the entire game, McLaughlin said.

"I'm a little concerned with our energy level going into a game," he said. "It's almost like we have to get behind before we really start to compete. Our energy level, our competitiveness needs to be good from start to finish. "We need to work on that, coming out in games ready to go."

Part of the Cats' struggles to compete early can be attributed to their youth, however, junior middle blocker Jayne Christen said.

"We have tended to start a little slow this year, and I think some of that is because we're kind of a young team, and we have some inexperience that is getting better," she said. "You're kind of feeling out what the opposing team's going to do, and once you get a handle on what they're going to do, it's easier to get into your own rhythm and continue to do your best so that you can take care of them."

However, with the negative of starting slow comes a positive as well, McLaughlin said. K-State has shown an ability to rattle off strings of points to overcome deficits.

"It's the way you finish games, too, that are important, so we're finishing games OK," he said.

Nevertheless, K-State needs to increase its energy level, and to do so, the Cats will look to the emotional leadership of Lisa Mimick and Kelli Branting, McLaughlin said.

"I think its an individual thing that becomes contagious. Energy comes from your emotions, so you've got to get into it emotionally," he said. "You need two or maybe three people to carry the emotional load, and I think if Kelli and Lisa are carrying it, then its real — what you see is what you get with those guys.

"They need to carry the emotional load of this team, and that helps get our energy level going."

Different work ethic apparent in Wooldridge's coaching style

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

Fans will immediately notice differences between the Jim Wooldridge version of K-State basketball and that of his predecessor, Tom Asbury, players said.

This year, the Cats are in shape and working hard, senior guard Galen Morrison said.

"I've been in better condition during the summer than I was last year. We've got our big guys, Kelvin Howell and Joe Leonard, diving on the floor after loose balls, and people coming to our games are going to see that," Morrison said. "When you see a seven-footer diving out there for a loose ball with a guard, you think you got something.

"The half pace isn't going to get it done. Sometimes I just can't believe what we're doing compared to a year ago. I think it's good for us all, and I think we're going to be fine."

Such a reversal in the team's work ethic has several causes, but the most powerful force molding the team is Wooldridge. He's one tough coach, Morrison said.

"He's really tough, and that's good. Teams need coaches like that because that's just going to make you better," he said. "All that you have — he's going to get that out of you."

Also adding a spark to the team's intensity are the new players, all of whom have come from winning programs. As a result, they believe they can turn the program around, sophomore transfer Matt Siebrandt said.

"I've never been on a losing team. I can't stand losing — that's not me — so I think we're going to be all right," he said. "I think we're going to be a winning team. I just want to bring a winning attitude to this team because I know last year it was something they were missing."

That kind of attitude is what Wooldridge is trying to bring to K-State, as he demands toughness and a desire to win, he said.

"That's our biggest challenge — developing toughness, developing commitment, developing work ethic. These are things that have a residual effect upon everything we do on the floor," Wooldridge said.

Of course, sometimes that development takes time, and the case is no different with K-State. The team has shown steady improvement, but there are always bumps in the road, one of which K-State hit a two weeks ago, Wooldridge said.

"Saturday, we practiced twice, and when we walked out of there Saturday night, I don't know that I have felt any worse about a team that I have been involved with," he said. "I was really upset with our team. I didn't think our team competed hard enough that day. I didn't think they showed the commitment to improve our team that day. I thought we had some guys not show leadership that day."

Consequently, the team needs to learn that improvement is a season-long process, Wooldridge said.

"We talk about how tough we need to be — tough, physically tough, mentally tough. And I think that's a process, too," he said. "I don't think you just wake up one day as a basketball team and say, 'Well, we're going to be tough today.'"

Perhaps that lesson is starting to sink in. That Saturday practice might have been disheartening, but the players think they got the message, junior transfer Larry Reid said.

"You just have to come back the next day with your head up and come out even harder," he said. "Give 110 percent — give more than what he's asking for."

teamwork

key to making each day an improvement

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

"Team" has been a recurring term in head coach Jim Wooldridge's vocabulary. He won't deny it, and his administration of the men's basketball program has reflected just that, Wooldridge said, as the team has formed a common goal.

"Better than we were yesterday, and better than we were the day before — that's what we talk to our team about a lot — better today than you were yesterday," he said. "Let's learn to concentrate for longer periods of time today than we did yesterday. Let's give more of an effort today than we did yesterday. And we have preached on countless days about this team approach — that the whole is better than any one given part.

"And in order to that, we all have to sacrifice something. We have to give more of ourselves to fit into the whole, so that this whole can be better and we can find our way out of last place."

Senior Kelvin Howell said he knows what it's like to be in the conference cellar, and this team intends to do something about it.

"It's been motivation ever since the season was over last year, but it's not a burden on my mind," Howell said. "I don't think about it constantly that we're 12th. It's not anything right now cause everything's about to start over."

That new beginning starts with the Wooldridge era, and the Cat coach has received a welcomed reception from his players, junior forward Travis Reynolds said, especially when looking at Wooldridge's involvement in practices.

"He's an in-the-process guy. When you make a mistake, he's going to stop you right then," Reynolds said. "He doesn't wait till like 10 plays later and then come back and say, 'Do you remember when this happened?' He stops you right then and corrects the mistake, and you'll know not to do the same thing again."

Reynolds said Wooldridge and the new coaching staff have had a positive effect on the team so far, especially on the returning players from former head coach Tom Asbury's squad.

"The end of last season was very difficult for us with the losing streak and some things going on with the coach," Reynolds said. "But we've got a fresh start with a new coaching staff and new players. We're very optimistic about this upcoming season, and we feel like we can do a lot of things in the Big 12. We'll just have to work hard and take it one game at a time."

However, Wooldridge said he isn't surprised that those returning players hung on after last year's dismal 9-19 record, including 2-14 in the conference.

"I just think they didn't know what was going to happen. Where was their niche in this program? What was going to happen to them individually in the program?" Wooldridge said. "I think they were very concerned about themselves and their future, and as we told them from day one, this is what we're going to be and this is how we're going to go about our daily business.

"If you can do these things, you can be a part of this program. And it took a while before I knew the kids believed in what we were saying and how we were going about our daily business, but I really think we have them all aboard right now.

That challenge has been made easier for Wooldridge and his staff, as the Cat coach said the returning players are eager to do what's necessary to succeed.

"I really believe that the kids returning in our program want to be better, and that's something that has pleased me," Wooldridge said. "When we tell them something, we feel like they believe it, and — every coach sells something — we're selling a method of play, a format of play, a system of play.

"We are selling this team approach. We are trying to take all the individualism out and go and preach and sell the whole. So those returning players — I believe this to be true — I think they're hanging on each word now, believing that if we do this and if we do this with all our heart, we can find our way out of this and be a better basketball team."

And those returning players are excited to get the chance, Howell said, but not without any added pressures.

For instance, Howell will be filling the void left by the graduated Tony Kitt, who Crew works to regain Showdown Cup

By DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

After losing the Sunflower Showdown cup for the first time in the regatta's three-year history in 1999, head coach Jenny Hale wants it back.

"Obviously, we don't want to give the cup up, and we're eager to go take it back, but I'm not dwelling on it," she said. "I think you've got to focus on the process. It certainly fires up the kids to think about it, but they need to concentrate on competing one stroke at a time."

However, assistant coach Kevin Harris said he has seen a fire in Hale's eyes this week as well.

"She wants that cup back," Harris said. "There's no question in any of the players or coaches' minds about that."

The K-State women's rowing team will try to harness that electric spirit when it heads east on Interstate 70 on Saturday toward Lawrence, to complete the team's fall schedule with a dual sprints regatta against the University of Kansas at Clinton Lake.

Even Hale's rowers have noticed the coach's increased level of excitement this week, senior Emily Benz said.

"She sees it as a good rivalry," Benz said. "She absolutely bleeds purple, and I think subliminally she puts more emphasis on it because it's a pride thing for her."

Traditionally, both the Wildcats and Jayhawks have rowed well in this race, with K-State holding a slim lead in all-time points, 39-37. That margin is enough to create an intrastate rivalry that even freshman Katie Baxter, native of Michigan, said she understands.

"It's probably one of the biggest rivalries," Baxter said. "I'm not even from Kansas, and I can feel it."

Benz has rowed in the Showdown since its beginning in 1997, and said she likes how competitive the race has come to be ran.

"I'd definitely say I like it when it's close like this," Benz said. "It makes us kind of sit up and notice that week during the season."

Benz will be racing in her final Showdown on Saturday, a regatta that has added significance in her eyes.

"It means more for me," the senior said, "since it will be the last time I'll be in this race."

This year's regatta will feature a Kansas varsity eight boat that has changed somewhat from previous years.

Since winning the last two varsity eight+ races, the Jayhawks have lost an impressive group of varsity rowers, which Benz said might be a factor Saturday.

"They had a group of eight to 10 girls that rowed together since they were freshmen, but they graduated," Benz said, "so that might be an advantage for us."

Although KU might have had the upper hand in varsity competition in the past, K-State's novice rowers have done particularly well in their races. The Cat squad will look to extend their current two-year streak in the novice eight+, relying on the unity that has developed on this year's Powercubs.

"We've got a really strong corps group of novice girls," Benz said of the novice team, which put together a productive year, including a first-place finish at the American Royal Fall Rowing Classic earlier this fall.

Freshman novice rower Lori Holcomb said that the desire will be there this weekend, but execution and style will determine the winner of the novice class.

"I think we're just going to go out there and run our own race," Holcomb said. "We're going to have to be aggressive. We all want it real bad, and we're going to have to row well."

Holcomb also is new to the Showdown, but said the opportunity to row against the Jayhawks will be exciting.

started all 28 games last season in leading the Cats in rebounding, blocks and minutes played, while also finishing second in scoring with 12.6 points per game.

"People expect a lot from you, because Tony Kitt left the floor with a lot of great things on his shoulders," Howell said, "so it's going to be my job to pick that up."

That job starts Monday with the Wildcats' first exhibition game of the season.

"It's a good thing, it's a positive thing that we have two exhibition games," Wooldridge said. "I wish we had four or five or even 10. I wish we played the NBA exhibition schedule."

Nevertheless, the coach's main objective for Monday is for K-State to play as a unit.

"It all goes back to that whole approach — team approach," he said.

Creative Marriage Proposal Checklist

Below is a list of things to remember when preparing a personalized marriage proposal. The information is from the article Popping the Age-Old Question With Newfound Style from "Down On One Knee," by Christy Anderson.

- Have you identified a creative scenario that strikes you as the perfect fit for her?
- Have you secured the various supplies and preparations necessary?
- Have you thought about what friend or family member you might need to help you?
- Have you given her the appropriate clues to pull it off?
- Have you arranged for the location to be available?
- Have you decided how you want to word your proposal?
- Have you investigated what type, style and cut of diamond she likes?
- Have you determined whether to let her pick it out or whether you'll surprise her?
- Have you purchased or made plans to purchase the diamond?
- Have you selected a date and time to pop the question?

Classical quartet brings variety to campus

By SARAH MCCAFFREY
Kansas State Collegian

Strings will be making music this weekend.

The internationally renowned Carmina String Quartet will be performing 7 p.m. Sunday in All Faiths Chapel as part of this year's McCain Performance Series.

The quartet will be playing selected pieces form Mozart, Beethoven and Ravel.

Thom Jackson, marketing and development officer for McCain Auditorium, said the critically acclaimed group is popular in Europe and is gaining a large fan base in the United States.

"Part of their popularity has to do with the wide and diverse program they offer," Jackson said. "They are also a very refined group."

Another factor that contributes to the group's popularity is the ability to express the music as the composers intended, Jackson said.

One of the reasons the quartet was asked to perform at K-State was the selection it offers.

"The pieces that are being played are attractive to the Manhattan audience," Jackson said. "It's not run-of-the-mill stock."

Although the quartet has released several albums, Jackson said he urges people to attend the performance on Sunday.

"It's music that should be heard live," he said. "What you hear on a CD misses the element of spontaneity."

The performance site was chosen because of the atmosphere that All Faiths Chapel contributes to the overall experience.

"All Faiths Chapel really has beautiful acoustics and it's a more intimate setting to play in," Jackson said. "Smaller concerts are more effective in the interpretation of the music when you are much closer to the artist."

Prior to the performance, Cora Cooper, associate professor of music, will present a pre-performance lecture at 6 p.m. in McCain 204. The lecture is expected to last about 45 minutes.

"I'll be talking about the pieces a little bit and about Mozart and Beethoven and their relationship to each other," Cooper said.

The purpose of a the lecture is to give people more background on the composer and the pieces so they have an idea of what to listen for, she said.

"The opening of the Mozart is really spectacular and really unusual," Cooper said.

She said she also encourages people to watch for the non-verbal interaction between members of the quartet.

"It really is a living art form," Cooper said. "It's a team sport."

TICKETS
Tickets are $20 for the general public, $18 for seniors and $10 for students. They can be ordered at the McCain Box Office or by calling 532-6428.

Irish dance group to perform in Bramlage

By MICHELLE BERTUGLIA
Kansas State Collegian

A part of Ireland is coming to Bramlage Coliseum on Sunday evening.

The Irish dance group Spirit of the Dance will perform at 7:30 p.m. Sunday at Bramlage.

The dance group will fill the evening with traditional Irish dance complete with modern Irish costumes and music, Jim Muller, associate director of Bramlage, said.

"It is very much a '90s show, a millennium show," Muller said. "It will be a night of traditional Irish step dancing with a really modern theme."

For Barbara Podschun, housemother at Sigma Alpha Epsilon, it will be her second time seeing the group preform.

She said the lights and the costumes and perpetual dancing are enthralling.

"It is just a constant dance that is very rigid," Podschun said.

"They are very disciplined and very precise in their dancing; the music and motion is really constant. It is colossal to me how they have the energy to keep dancing."

The troupe is a part of Dublin World Wide Productions, and has preformed the show on Broadway.

Muller said the group adapted the show from the Broadway stage to the arena atmosphere by adding audio gear and lighting.

He said adapting the show to this environment will give it a little bit of a concert atmosphere.

"You will see a Broadway-type of production for a larger audience at Bramlage," Muller said.

Cultural performances like this, he said, are important to the livelihood of Manhattan.

"We are always searching for different types of performances to bring into the community, and the more diverse the entertainment we bring in, the better the quality of life in the community," Muller said.

"We are a public window and university — anything we can bring in that is different is good for the overall value of the community.

Groups such as Spirit of the Dance are a positive step for Manhattan, Podschun said.

"Usually, things like this are in bigger cities, and I have gone to lots of places to see big performances, but if we don't patronize them here, they won't come back," Podschun said.

"Sunday's performance will be an opportunity for students and the community to learn about other cultures."

but he said the shuttle's short route would probably not allow it to prosper on campus. He said the city system would help promote valuable city and university interaction.

Another open house also was Thursday night at City Hall's City Commission room. The results of an optional survey at the two open houses will be discussed by a steering committee Nov. 8, said Karen Davis, director of community development for Manhattan.

"We need to do what we think is best for the community and K-State," Davis said. "I think we're going to get a good cross section of people."

Davis said the steering committee would finalize a recommendation in December. The recommendation would then be sent to City Commission in January.

To voice your opinion on public transportation in Manhattan, contact Ted Rieck at tjrieck@transystems.com

Additional open houses will continue next spring. The proposal could be finalized by April, Davis said.

If public transportation is deemed feasible, Davis said the results of the government census, which probably would be available next spring, could help pay for the system. She said federal transit funds would be issued if Manhattan's population exceeds 50,000 people.

Ted Rieck, TranSystems' associate, said he was impressed with the open house attendance. He said feedback will help his company develop a beneficial transit plan.

"I think people are curious at this point," he said. "I'm hearing positive responses on the community-wide system."

Preparation, focus get Cats on track to PUT IT ALL TOGETHER

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

Iowa State 28, K-State 7.

That score glistened in the afternoon sunlight last season in Ames, as the host Cyclones humiliated the Wildcats in the first half at Jack Trice Stadium, out gaining K-State 332-102 in total offense.

Iowa State and tailback Darren Davis, who rushed for more than 130 yards and two touchdowns through two quarters of play, ran all over a Cat defense that ranked second nationally, notching 18 first downs to K-State's five.

That was the first half.

The tables turned in the second stanza, as the Cats reeled off 28 unanswered points to stun the Cyclones on their home turf, marking K-State's greatest comeback in school history in surpassing the previous record of a 17-point deficit at Oklahoma State in 1971.

Sparking that rally was All-American David Allen, whose 94-yard punt return for a touchdown narrowed the Iowa State lead to 28-21 with 10:01 left in the game.

However, the come-from-behind win was possible thanks to adjustments at halftime, defensive coordinator Phil Bennett said, as the Cats rectified their defensive and coaching let-downs, limiting the Cyclones to a meager four first downs in the final two quarters of action.

"We weren't putting them in a good situation — I wasn't," Bennett said. "We got it corrected, and I think we held them to 73 or 74 yards in the second half."

Seventy-four yards to be exact, as K-State won its Big 12 opener and improved to 11-2 in conference road games.

"It was very important, because it was early in the season," senior wide-out Aaron Lockett said. "That was the first test of our manhood throughout the team."

Now, the fields will be reversed Saturday, as Iowa State travels to KSU Stadium for a North Division battle.

"We're back here in Manhattan, and all the fans will definitely be there cheering us on," Lockett said. "They know we've struggled this year, but they know what we're capable of — and I think that's the important thing."

Regardless, however, head coach Bill Snyder said the Sept. 25, 1999, contest with the Cyclones will have no affect on this weekend's match up.

"I don't think last year plays into this at all," he said. "We can draw from last year's ball game, an understanding that they were good enough to have us down by 21and yet, we were good enough to come back and win the ball game. I think you can draw from both sides of that, and it sends a warning as well.

"But I don't think the outcome over the years affects our preparation for this ball game. I hope I'm remaining consistent in saying it all boils down to how we prepare ourselves. Period."

That preparation will be important considering K-State is coming off losses in two out of the past three games, making the team feel like a wounded animal, Lockett said.

"I think a lot of teams are confident when it comes to playing us, because they know that we've struggled at times, and if they last out long enough, we'll hurt ourselves with the penalties and things like that," he said. "But let them keep thinking that, and pretty soon when we come around, we're going to put it all together.

"I've been here for four years, and I've never had that feeling, but it's something that you need to go through to get better."

Such betterment can be attained Saturday, by not dwelling on Cat errors

Wildcats focusing on Iowa State, not dwelling on team's struggles

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

K-State's focus is on Iowa State this weekend, no questions asked, wide-out Aaron Lockett said.

Despite media criticism, a drop in the national rankings and a sputtering offense to contend with, the senior co-captain said the team cannot afford to look at it any other way.

"I think Iowa State definitely has played a tough schedule throughout the year, but any time you lose two games, you can't look ahead to anybody else," he said. "I think Iowa State is important in our minds right now, and I think it's important that we come in and play well."

That mentality is essential, Lockett said, as the question is raised whether the Cats should be concerned more with the Cyclones or more with themselves.

"I would have to say Iowa State for me personally, because I would never lose confidence in myself, otherwise I'd stop playing this game," Lockett said. "And I think our team, as a whole, is worried about Iowa State because we are confident — we know what we can do, and we can make plays. It's just important that we go out and do it."

That chance will come at 11:38 a.m. Saturday with the opening kick-off at KSU Stadium, as No. 19/15 K-State (7-2, 3-2) battles unranked Iowa State (6-2, 3-2) for second place in the Big 12 North Division standings behind Nebraska.

Offensive coordinator Ron Hudson said the Cyclones present a difficult obstacle for the Cats this weekend, one that will benefit the players.

"Quite frankly, I'm glad Iowa State's a good team, because it'll challenge our players — I'm glad that they're coming in at 6-2," Hudson said. "Our players, they're not going to come out, jump up and down and whoop and holler. They've just got to know now that they've got to bring their lunch pail and go to work."

One necessary area of work is limiting turnovers, head coach Bill Snyder said, which stems from the three interceptions thrown in the 26-10 loss to Texas A&M.

"On a scale of one to 10, it's a 50, probably," Snyder said in rating his anxiety level dealing with the Cats' turnover margin. "(A&M) didn't turn the ball over at all — that's a great credit to that football team — and we turned it over three times. So there's an awful lot of field position involved with that, and it's a major concern."

Conversely, Snyder said he's been quite impressed with Iowa State's manageability of the football.

"You're looking at a football team that through the course of their entire season has been credited with only four fumbles, and only two of those have been turned over to their opponents," Snyder said. "Now that's an excellent statistic.

"And they've had nine interceptions, if I recall correctly, so that's only 11 turnovers, and that's probably not an inordinate amount at all, and certainly it's a very enviable stat in terms of fumbles."

Coupled with the Cyclones' ability to control the ball, sixth-year ISU head coach Dan McCarney's squad boasts a very even offensive scheme as well, Snyder said.

"I think they're an extremely well-balanced football team. They throw for a little over 225 yards a game, and they're rushing for a little over 200 a game," he said. "That's tremendous balance."

Jarrod Cooper reaches out and pulls down Iowa State's Darren Davis as he tries to get outside on a run in the first half of last season's game in Ames. Davis had 131 yards on 17 carries in the first half, which helped the Cyclones lead 28-7 going into halftime. Even though Davis has left Iowa State, K-State still has the running ability of Ennis Haywood to consider as he leads the Big 12 in rushing with 133 yards per game.

Quick facts

– K-State and Iowa State are tied for second in the Big 12 North Division standings with 3-2 records, trailing only Nebraska, who boasts a 4-1 mark.
– In the Wildcats' last outing, the team fell 26-10 to Texas A&M in College Station, dropping to No. 15 and 19, respectively, in the USA Today/Coaches and Associated Press polls.
– Head coach Bill Snyder's Wildcats fell out of the BCS rankings this week for the first time since its formation in 1998.
– K-State is one of only 17 Division I-A teams with at least seven wins this season.
– Iowa State posts a 6-2 record for only the sixth time in school history since 1915, while also being assured its first winning season since 1989.
– A win by the bowl-eligible Cyclones on Saturday would mark the first time an ISU team has won more than six games since the 1978 Hall of Fame Bowl unit posted an 8-4 record.
– The Cyclones are coming off a 39-20 win over Missouri at home last weekend, in which they racked up 495 yards of total offense.
– Iowa State is a perfect 3-0 on the road this season, with victories over Iowa, Baylor and Oklahoma State. However, head coach Dan McCarney is winless against Snyder in his previous five tries.
– Snyder and McCarney coached together for 10 seasons at the University of Iowa as assistants under Hayden Fry.

Series history

Series overall – Iowa State leads 46-33-4
Series in Manhattan – tied 20-20-1, including 8-8 at KSU Stadium
Streak – K-State has won six
Last meeting – K-State won, 35-28 (Sept. 25, 1999) in Ames, Iowa

Injury update

– Senior fullback Johnno Lazetich (concussion) and true freshman offensive lineman Nick Leckey (leg) both will remain sidelined for the Iowa State contest and are expected to be out another week, Snyder said.
– Place kicker Jamie Rheem will play against the Cyclones, but the Cat coach said he still is not 100-percent due to recurring muscle soreness.
– Senior tight end Shad Meier is questionable for Saturday. "Shad has a chance this week – I don't know how that will materialize," Snyder said Tuesday. "As we stand after last night's workout, the feeling is that he has a chance to play this weekend, if not, the next."

Offense works to overcome adversity

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

The solution to K-State's offensive woes against Texas A&M doesn't require a vast redrafting of the entire offensive game plan. The Cats don't need to start from scratch and rebuild.

In fact, fixing the offense really is simple, offensive coordinator Ron Hudson said.

"Don't drop the ball. Don't throw the interception," he said.

If the Cats had not done those things in College Station, they actually would have done a better job of following the game plan — but they didn't and lost as a result, Hudson said.

"Don't throw an interception on the first play of the game. That wasn't part of the plan," he said.

"That's what we screwed up. I think there's been some poor decisions by the quarterback in throwing the ball, pass protection has made him scramble around a little bit more, and we've dropped some balls — you put those things together, and that's what's going to happen, and that's why we're struggling right now.

"We just didn't execute when we had to execute — that's what it came down to."

That lack of execution doesn't just apply to the passing game, either. The rushing attack also has been inconsistent due to poor execution, Hudson said.

"There's some guys that haven't got their blocks finished, and some guys have been able to make plays off that, and that's about it," he said. "I don't think our running game has suffered that much because of personnel with the running backs, as much as we're missing blocks up front."

If lack of execution is the problem as Hudson said, the tricky part becomes figuring out why the team has dipped since the first six games of the season in making even the most basic plays.

The answer could be that those mistakes were always there. The only difference is, wins make mistakes easier to swallow, wide receiver Aaron Lockett said.

K-State wide receiver Aaron Lockett lays out to try to catch a pass from quarterback Jonathan Beasley. Lockett has 29 catches, 472 yards and two touchdowns so far this year. Last season, Lockett had 33 catches for 531 yards and three touchdowns overall.

"It's easy because when you lose you look at everything, and it looks a little bit worse than it really is," Lockett said. "I think that if you go back and look at some of the first six games that we're winning by 40 and 50 points, then some of the things that happened, people would give you an alibi for — 'Oh, it was a mistake' — or something like that, but then when you lose, people tend to make it a little bit bigger than what it is."

Losing might place too much emphasis on some mistakes, but every miscue by a player is important, Lockett said.

"People don't realize it, but when one person struggles it's like a chain reaction because we're so close, we're so family related."

Perhaps the player whose actions can most influence the rest of the offense is quarterback Jonathan Beasley. His ability to audible the offense into an effective play has been lauded all season, but perhaps now he's trying to do too much play-changing at the line, Hudson said.

"I think in the approach to Jonathan, I probably put a little too much on him. He was trying to create things that he didn't have to," Hudson said. "If he were just to stay within the scheme of things, I think he would've been fine. But that's not his responsibility — that's my responsibility."

However, Hudson isn't responsible for throwing the ball. Beasley is, and those mistakes aren't the norm for K-State's signal caller, so drastic measures may have to be taken to ensure that poor play doesn't become commonplace, Hudson said.

"He missed some throws Saturday that he normally had been making, but you can't dwell on that. You've got to be positive on the phone, and I do that," Hudson said. "Now I'll get after him. If he continues to flounder, I'll just say, 'Listen, we'll make a change unless you snap out of this thing.'"

FOCUS

The Iowa State passing game is engineered by senior QB Sage Rosenfels, who looks to hit big-play receiver J.J. Moses, who ranks second in the Big 12 in receptions per game.

Meanwhile, the ground game, despite the absence of Darren Davis, who finished his Cyclone career second in school history in rushing yards, is led by tailback Ennis Haywood.

The junior leads the conference in rushing and sits eighth nationally, tallying 214 yards and two TD's last weekend against Mizzou to elevate his average to 133 yards per game. Haywood also leads the Big 12 in all-purpose yards.

"He's come in and he's put up, if not the same, then definitely a little bigger numbers than Davis did," Lockett said of Haywood. "And he's a lot bigger than Davis, and I think that's something we're going to take into consideration."

In the meantime, the Cyclone defense is led by two seniors, defensive end Reggie Hayward and defensive tackle James Reed, who top the charts in tackles this season with 71 and 64, respectively.

But aside to personnel, Snyder said much of Iowa State's success can be accredited to its head coach. McCarney, a former assistant coach at the University of Iowa with Snyder, has assured his team its first winning season since 1989.

"I have seen steady progress throughout," Snyder said. "I have a great deal of respect for Dan McCarney and the coaches on that staff — I've coached with Dan for ten years, and I know what he's capable of doing.

"I understand the way that he's approached it, and I don't think there was ever any doubt in my mind that they would have a successful program."

Cats build character through losses

DEREK BOSS

A loss builds character.

That philosophy might seem hard to swallow, but I've grown to become a firm believer — at least most of the time.

After K-State's disappointing loss to Oklahoma, I was anything but concerned that the Wildcats would bounce back strong against Texas Tech.

They didn't.

In fact, they squeaked by the Red Raiders 28-23 in less-than-stellar fashion. What was the problem? Why didn't the character-testing game against the Sooners show up on the field against Tech? What happened to the dominating squad we saw in the first six games of the season?

Or did K-State just receive too much credit when it succeeded and too much criticism when it failed? The national rankings and BCS poll would certainly indicate that's the case.

But, in all actuality, those are questions I simply can't answer.

I'll admit that my confidence in the team was shaken a bit after the Tech contest, but I pressed on. I thought, what better way to get back on track than a win over Texas A&M in College Station?

That didn't happen, either.

So I was left trying to pick up the pieces, trying to rationalize the situation laid before me. Sure, my belief in the Wildcats took another swift kick, but it was just a flesh wound.

Let's just say my faith had a resurrection of sorts, compliments of head coach Bill Snyder. Now for those of you that haven't had the opportunity to meet him, he's one of those guys that has complete and utter control of his emotions — so much so that every word from his mouth has a convincing resonance to it. It's hard not to believe the guy.

If he told me that the K-State men's basketball team would make it to the Final Four this year, I'd have a flight and hotel room booked in an instant — no questions asked (now that's a convincing man).

At Tuesday's press conference, Snyder spoke to my philosophy that a loss builds character.

"I don't think it's a bad thing for it to happen, now I would rather that we test it in a different way," he said. "But there is good that comes from it — I certainly believe that because I think all young people need to really understand, as all of us do, that there are far greater difficulties in life than what they're facing right now.

"And how they respond to these issues, perhaps, sets the foundation for how they respond to so many adversities that will occur in their own personal lives as well. So, yes, I think there's some positive that can and should come from a loss of facing this kind of adversity."

(I'll pause to let his words sink in, it won't take them long to convince you, too.)

What a challenge for a head coach. Here's a guy who's given the task of leading a team of 130-odd players through that kind of adversity and getting them all molded into the same frame of mind. Let's just say better him than I. And not only does he accomplish it, but it almost looks easy for him.

That's why I'm NOT worried. K-State WILL get back on track, and they'll show that this weekend against Iowa State. Forget about a repeat performance of last season in Ames — we won't be needing to make a comeback.

And I'm not hiding anything from you when I say it'll all come down to the Nebraska game Nov. 11.

A win — a Big 12 Championship berth and good shot at the Fiesta Bowl.

A loss — Well, let's just say we might have to revisit the Alamo.

Despite last year, Cyclones ready for Saturday

JEREMY GUSTAFSON

So, do you remember last year?

Iowa State led one of the top programs in the nation 28-7 at halftime. The Cyclones played like champs for one half of football — in fact, they looked unbeatable.

It was the win that would have completely transformed Iowa State football to national contenders.

Unfortunately, games aren't won in the first half.

Iowa State played like chumps in the second half, and K-State demolished the Cyclones and sent them into a rut they would not recover from for the rest of the year.

That was then. This is now. Iowa State has a chance to prove itself. All the critics say they haven't beaten a team with tradition. Well, K-State has tradition.

The Wildcats haven't looked that good since they started playing in the Big 12, but that isn't hard to believe since their pre-conference schedule stops just short of playing Mt. St. Mary's Sisters of the Poor.

K-State beat Iowa 27-7, Louisiana Tech 54-10, Ball State in a squeaker, 76-0, and mighty North Texas 55-10.

It started off playing solid in the Big 12, beating up Kansas and Colorado. But in the last three games, the Wildcats record is 1-2, because they have played powerhouses Oklahoma and Texas A&M.

The Sooners took the Wildcats behind the woodshed and held on for a 41-31 victory. After squeaking by Texas Tech 28-23, K-State took it on the chin again against A&M. The Aggies dominated K-State 26-10 at College Station, leaving the Wildcats searching for their identity.

Iowa State has found its identity. By clinching the team's first winning season since 1989, the Cyclones are riding an emotional high.

There is a chance that the Cyclones might be able to shock the nation again, this time for four quarters, but they will have to play their best game of the year.

Jonathan Beasley is lighting up the scoreboard, throwing for 13 touchdowns and nearly 2,000 yards so far this season.

The Wildcats have the best set of receivers in the Big 12 with Quincy Morgan, Aaron Lockett and Martez Wesley. They will torment the Cyclone d-backs all day.

And just when you thought it was safe and you got the passing game slowed down, enter Josh Scobey and David Allen. The two have combined for 628 yards on the year. Beasley is capable of running, too, as he is the team's second leading rusher with 334 yards.

Iowa State will have to find ways to stop the offense and score on the Wildcat defense, something that hasn't been easy this season. The Wildcats have been giving up an average of just more than 16 points per game.

Something will have to give.

Iowa State played solidly against Nebraska, but folded in the fourth quarter. The Cyclones didn't show up against A&M, much like K-State.

This game is more important for K-State than one might think. If they hope to make a run for the Big 12 title, a win is a must.

For Iowa State, a win would mean they could be playing closer to Jan. 1 than ever before, and that the program truly has turned into a contender.

Offensive team still optimistic for season

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

K-State hasn't been the same team offensively the past three games that it was earlier in the season.

The question now becomes, how do the Cats get back to that level of play? The answer, according to receiver Martez Wesley, is to start enjoying the game again.

"We need to get back to having fun, that's my main thing. When we were having fun, we were doing a damn good job of moving the ball," he said.

"Here lately, it's almost been to a point where it's been business, where you can't have fun, and focus and things like that get tied into it. I really think we just need to get back to having fun and go out there and play with the blessings that God has given us, which is our talent.

"I truly think many people take this too seriously, and when you take things too seriously, you tend to have a lack in concentration."

In addition to not focusing, the Cats have had another more serious problem, especially at Texas A&M, head coach Bill Snyder said.

"This past weekend, I was not convinced that we were ready to play," he said.

To remedy that situation, K-State must prepare itself in practice to play well during the game. Although the saying, "You play like you practice," has been around for a while, it seems to invariably remain true, wide-out Aaron Lockett said.

"I think that a lot of people, probably including myself sometimes, don't realize that some of things that you do on Tuesday will affect you on Saturday because you feel you can turn it on come game day," he said.

"And I think that's not really the way it happens, so I think it's important that we practice throughout the week like we want to play on Saturday."

Making that decision, whether to change the current pattern, defines what kind of people K-State has on its team. The players who truly love the game and want to win will do whatever is necessary to reach that conclusion, Wesley said.

"This is a time of year where players are made. It's so late in the year, and anybody could give it up right now, anybody could quit and say they don't want to do this, do that, say 'I'm sorry' — anybody can complain," he said.

"But this is the time where you look yourself in the mirror and see how much you really like this game and how much you really want to do for this team."

Lockett said he agreed that the time has arrived for players to step up on the field.

"You can only talk so much and so long. We've been going hard at it since August 2, so I think everybody knows the goals that can be attained, so there's really not much that can be said about it, just the fact of going out and doing it," he said.

Warren fills void left by Meier's absence

By DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

Nick Warren has no problem taking a back seat to senior tight end Shad Meier — when he needs to.

"It's not hard to take a secondary role," Warren said. "You understand that the guy ahead of you is there for a reason."

However, in only his second start of the year, and fifth of his career, the junior tight end made the most of his chances in the Wildcats' 26-10 loss to Texas A&M last weekend.

On his way to earning offensive player of the week honors against the Aggies, Warren's three receptions for 50 yards set game, season and career highs in both categories.

One of Warren's catches last week was an impressive one-handed grab on a pass that senior quarterback Jonathan Beasley said was a mistake.

"I thought it was great because I threw it, and I said, 'Oh man, I overthrew him,' but he grabbed it and pulled it down," Beasley said.

Warren agreed with Beasley and said the catch had more to do with being lucky than being good.

"That's the first one-handed catch I think I've ever made," Warren said. "I wasn't trying to make a one-handed grab, though. I was just trying to catch the ball. It all happened so fast."

Whether it was luck or skill, Warren still was critical of his performance.

"I wouldn't necessarily call it a success," Warren said. "We didn't win, and that's the No. 1 thing that matters to me. And then, in the Texas Tech game, I didn't perform as well as I needed to."

MORE INFO

Tight end Nick Warren was named the Wildcats' offensive player of the week in only the fifth start of his career after compiling 50 yards on three catches in both games, season and career highs for the junior.

However, running backs coach Michael Smith said he was excited Warren had the chance to show K-State coaches and fans his skills on the field the last couple of games, especially against A&M.

"I was happy for Nick to have that opportunity and take advantage of it the way he did this weekend," Smith said. "We've always thought Nick was a good athlete. It wasn't surprising that he went out there and did as well as he did."

Warren's production on a fill-in basis is illustrative of what K-State's reserves have done all year.

When Meier and other team members such as David Allen and Jarrod Cooper went down with various injuries earlier this season, it could have spelled disaster for the Wildcats, as head coach Bill Snyder relied on some of his more inexperienced players to carry an ailing team.

However, as statistics this year have shown, players such as Aaron Lockett on the punt return unit, Chris Claybon and Josh Scobey at tailback, Milton Proctor at safety and Warren at tight end have helped ease the load for Snyder and the rest of the Cats.

K-State tight end Nick Warren fights a tackle from Texas A&M free safety Michael Jameson on Saturday at College Station, Texas. Warren stepped up to fill in for Shad Meier, who was out with an injury and is questionable to return against Iowa State. Warren had three catches for 50 yards in the A&M game.

Like other Wildcat reserves, Warren's success has not gone to his head, though, and the 6-foot, 7-inch Eudora, Kan., native is content with relinquishing his role to Meier once he is healthy enough to return to the lineup.

"Shad Meier has proven that he is the starting tight end for this football team," Warren said, "because before he got injured, he was having a tremendous year."

Similarly, the other Wildcat reserves have given the team's regular starters their full support for the rest of the season.

David Allen gradually has worked himself back into running back and punt return duties, and Jarrod Cooper recently has recovered from his injury to regain his strong safety position.

As a result of the success of second-string players, the Wildcats have developed into a deeper team, Smith said, one that the coaches can rely on in upcoming seasons as well as this year.

"Nick is not that big of a drop-off — he showed that this weekend," Smith said. "A&M has some good linebackers, and he did a good job against those guys. We expect him to step up as a leader next year as a senior."

Filling the tight end role, while Meier recovers from injury, has helped Warren to gain valuable game time experience, something he'll need when he's asked to contribute on a more regular basis next year as a starter for the Wildcats, offensive coordinator Ron Hudson said.

"Nick was a pleasant surprise," he said. "He did a good job — he kept us in the game. He's responded and competed, worked at it and got better."

For now, though, Warren said he's content with his role as Meier's shadow, waiting in the wings for his chance to shine for the Cats next year.

against the Cyclones last season, senior quarterback Jonathan Beasley said.

"I know that last year is last year, and I've learned from those mistakes. I'm just trying to get better," he said.

Beasley will need improvement, as the team co-captain struggled in Ames a year ago, completing 3-of-10 passes for 24 yards and an interception.

In fact, Beasley was pulled following K-State's first drive of the third quarter. His replacement, Adam Helm, went on to man the comeback, connecting on 7-of-11 attempts for 67 yards and rushing for 45 yards and two touchdowns.

Lockett said it's important for the Wildcats to get the offense going early this weekend, instead of letting the Cyclones elicit a repeat of last year.

"They got up early on us, and we're not the greatest team when we get down," he said. "When we get down, we get down a lot. We get down 19 or 21 points, and I think that if we can hold ourselves from getting in that position, we'll definitely be all right. But we know they're definitely coming out to compete."

Nevertheless, that competition won't be anything different from what the Cats have faced in recent weeks, junior free safety Jon McGraw said.

"You can look at the past couple weeks, and say that we sort of came out lackadaisical, and let teams get up on us and made us fight back," he said. "So that's going to be a big emphasis this week, coming out first quarter and being able to get something going."

GEORGE W. BUSH, REPUBLICAN — AL GORE, DEMOCRAT

THE ISSUES

The 2000 Presidential Election Guide to the Candidates

Abortion	Opposed to abortion except in cases of rape, incest and to protect the life of the mother. Supports late-term abortion restrictions.	Committed to making abortion safe, legal and rare. Would support late-term abortion restrictions if exceptions were made to woman's health.
Agriculture	Supports ethanol subsidies. Opposes efforts to increase farm prices by increasing federal price support level. Supports aggressive enforcement of antitrust laws to protect farmers from anti-competitive practices.	Supports ethanol subsidies. Supports mandatory price reporting and federal assistance in dealing with the current farm crisis. Supported a 6-percent increase in the Department of Agriculture's Agricultural Research Service in fiscal 2000 budget.
Campaign finance	Supports increasing individual contribution limits and instant contribution disclosure. Also supports a ban on soft money from corporations and labor unions, but not from individuals.	Supports the McCain-Feingold Bill that bans soft money, limits issue advertising and tightens disclosure laws.
Civil rights	Supports diversity, but opposes racial quotas and preferences. Opposes gay-discrimination laws. Opposes lifting ban on gays in military and supports "don't ask, don't tell" policy.	Believes affirmative action is still necessary. Supports funding the disability act. Wants to eliminate racial profiling. Favors allowing gays in the military and wants to eliminate the "don't ask, don't tell" policy.
Crime	Supports death penalty, instant background checks for gun purchases and raising the legal age for purchasing guns to 21. Opposed to trigger safety locks and universal gun registration.	Advocates more police and prosecutors, more federal anti-crime programs. Supports license, background checks and safety tests to purchase handguns. He also supports trigger safety locks.
Defense/foreign policy	Supports an expanded military, increasing military pay $1 billion per year for the next five years and increased spending for military housing. He advocates a cooperative trade relationship with China, but calls the country a competitor that does not share our values. Supported intervention in Yugoslavia.	Opposes trade sanctions against China. Supports free trade and open international markets. Supported use of military in Yugoslavia.
Education	Supports development of charter schools by investing $300 million in a charter school homestead fund to provide $3 billion in loan guarantees to 200 new charter schools. Supports providing additional college financial aid to high school students who take advanced courses in math and science.	Opposed to school vouchers. Proposes creation of a National Tuition Saving Program to help families invest their monies in special trusts that help pay for their children's tuition at universities outside of their states. Wants to hire 2.2 million new teachers and provide bonuses to people who change their professions to become teachers.
Environment	Supports oil and gas exploration in the Alaskan National Wildlife Refuge. Would instruct the Energy Department to identify other federal lands that could be opened to exploration. Opposed to tapping Strategic Petroleum Reserve except in instances of war or a national emergency.	Opposes oil and gas exploration in the Alaskan National Wildlife Refuge. Would devote an unspecified portion of the projected budget surplus to establish Energy Security and Environment Trust Fund. Supports tapping the Strategic Petroleum Reserve to increase oil supplies, prevent winter shortages of home heating oil and stabilize oil prices.
Gun control	Supports ban on automatic weapons, requiring background checks at gun shows and stronger enforcement of existing laws. Opposed to government-mandated registration of all guns owned by citizens.	Worked to pass Brady Law, allowing for more gun control. Favors smart and sensible gun control.
Social Security	Opposes any tax increase for Social Security but will not strongly advocate tax breaks until Social Security is saved. Supports long-term Social Security privatization.	Opposes privatization of Social Security or diverting funds from Social Security. Favors investing 62 percent of the budget surplus to continue Social Security until at least 2025.
Taxes	Favors a tax cut of $483 billion. Wants to install four rates of income taxes between 10 and 33 percent. Pledges to reduce the marriage penalty tax.	Favors a tax cut between $250 and $300 billion. Wants to raise the standard deduction for married couples. Supports deductions on secondary education.

Director stresses education

By TRAVIS HOCHARD
Kansas State Collegian

While many Americans believe that environmental education is important, some still hold misconceptions about environmental issues, said Marcia Sward, senior director of the Education and Environment Program.

Sward was a keynote speaker at the second annual Kansas Environmental Education Conference on Friday and Saturday in Salina. The conference, sponsored by the Kansas Association for Conservation and Environmental Education, focused on the preparation for the future of environmental education.

"It provides a forum for people to network, get new ideas and meet people in there field," said Shari Wilson, special products coordinator for KACEE.

The conference featured four keynote speakers, a silent auction, field trips and workshops ranging from the "ABCs of Fund Raising" to "Spineless Wonders: Insects in the Classroom."

"I found the conference very informative," said Travis Tenbrink, sophomore in park resources management. "It was nice to see so many people come together for environmental education."

The conference also had exhibits and booths from a variety of organizations such as the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency, U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, Kansas Geological Survey and the Kansas Rural Water Association.

"It is our job as environmental educators to teach people how to think, not what to think, and let the individual decide what they think is right," Laura Downey, executive director of KACEE, said.

Richard Bartlett, vice chairman of Mary Kay Inc., was one of the keynote speakers. He has been active in conservation for 40 years and is a member of the board of the National Environmental Education and Training Foundation.

"This is the generation that must develop environmental ethics that can be applied to the problems we will face in the next 25 years," Bartlett said. "We must

Mayor's meal raises funds, awareness

By JJ DUNCAN
Kansas State Collegian

Everyone paid $15 — some of them got steak, iced tea and dessert, some got water and scalloped potatoes.

The eighth annual Mayor's Hunger Experience Dinner, sponsored by the Flint Hills Breadbasket Community Food Network, took place on Sunday to begin the year 2000 Mayor's Holiday Tree.

The differences in the quality of the dinners were so great to exhibit how a certain percentage of the world is well-fed, some are moderately well-fed, and others are malnourished.

The dinner raises money for the holidays when the Flint Hills Breadbasket needs the most funds for needy families, said Shirley Bramhall, executive director of Flint Hills Breadbasket.

Bramhall said every year the event draws about 130 people and educates them about the nature of hunger.

"When people come in and they've never been to the dinner and they experience what it's like to watch other people get savory meals while they aren't given much, it educates them, and it's an incredible experience," she said.

Campusgreens vying to help win state recognition

By LYNNE HERMANSEN
Kansas State Collegian

Only two parties participated in this year's presidential debates, but voting for the Green Party might affect the 2004 presidential elections.

Campusgreens, a K-State Green Party organization, has created a petition trying to persuade Green voters to sign.

For the party to be officially recognized by the state of Kansas, 15,000 signatures are required.

"We received 145 signatures in six hours," Casey Parks, junior in anthropology, said. "It was a great experience, talking to people about things that I strongly believe in."

Campusgreens has set up a booth from 9:30 a.m. to 3:30 p.m. every Friday in the K-State Student Union.

"The petition has to be turned in to the state by Kansas Day, Jan. 29," Eric Leahy, junior in electrical engineering, said. "Our booth will be set up until then."

Nader, the Green Party presidential candidate, was not originally affiliated with the party.

"Nader and the Green Party just ended up coming together due to similar beliefs," Parks said.

Parks said Nader is worried about the concentration of wealth in the small percentage of the people in power, who are harming democracy.

"He is watching out for corporations harming environment and becoming monopolies," Parks said. "He believes that the corporations should have no input in the election process."

ELECTIONS 2000

Ralph Nader should have been allowed to participate in the presidential debates, Parks said.

"It was horrible, wrong and terribly unjust," Parks said. "Al Gore and Bush were scared of how Nader could expose them, expose them at all kinds of angles, and it could possibly mess up the two-party system."

Jared Wiesner, freshman in biology, agreed Nader should have been allowed to participate in the debates.

"It just proves that our government is one-sided," Wiesner said. "They refuse to let outside ideas infuse themselves into modern government."

Parks said Kansas voters do not want to vote for Nader because they

Wichita manufacturers to hire more employees

WICHITA — A booming general aviation industry has left Raytheon Aircraft Co., Cessna Aircraft Co. and Bombardier Aerospace seeking employees as they try to fill record backlogs of orders and put out new products at a brisk pace.

The three Wichita manufacturers are pulling out all the stops because their ability to meet current demand and grow in the future hinges on their ability to find workers now.

Together, the three plane makers figure they will add more than 1,500 jobs in 2001. Cessna plans to add 800 to 1,000 new positions, Raytheon more than 500 and Bombardier will add several hundred.

Bombardier in Wichita expects to hire about 300 technicians and sales and customer support positions to its service center by the end of next year. About 220 of the jobs will be new positions, said Dave Franson, a spokesman for the former Learjet plant in Wichita. It also will add dozens more jobs in production, engineering and flight testing, he said.

Electoral College to choose president

By JENN DAVOREN
Kansas State Collegian

ELECTIONS 2000

Anxious Americans might stay glued to their television sets for Tuesday evening's election results, but the next president of the United States won't become official until after the new year.

This lag is a result of the Electoral College, which allows U.S. citizens to choose a presidential candidate's representatives rather than the actual candidate.

Joseph Unekis, associate professor of political science, said the Electoral College was established in order to organize a revolutionary system of government.

"It was set up in the very beginning because, essentially, when we decided to have a president, it was an unprecedented move," he said. "The Founding Fathers chose to organize an election to decide the new leader. It raised a problem for the founders, because the country was so spread out."

These Founding Fathers feared leaving the decision in the hands of the general population, 80 percent of which was illiterate, and allowing a branch of the government to make the choice also was a poor option, Unekis said.

"They didn't want legislature to make the decision, because it would put the country under the thumb of the states," he said. "They decided to pick a one-time group of people whose only job is to tell us the best person to be president."

Ensuring that a new president would not become subservient to a branch of this new government was especially important, Tim Bagby, K-State political scientist, said.

"They believed at the time that having the legislature directly and regularly involved in the selection of the chief executive would make him too dependent on the legislature," he said.

The Electoral College was organized to go to work after the popular vote is tallied. The first Tuesday in November determines the winner of the popular vote in each state and decides which candidate will send his or her electors to the capital of each state in December. The six members of Kansas' Electoral College will meet in Topeka next month to cast their votes, Unekis said.

In January, the president of the Senate announces the final winner when electoral votes are counted.

Members of the Electoral College are chosen at larger party meetings and conventions, said Aruna Michie, associate professor of political science.

"It's really up to the parties in each state," she said. "The Kansas Republicans and Kansas Democrats work out their own mechanisms for choosing their own electors."

Kansas' six Electoral College members are generally chosen because of their contributions and loyalty to their parties, Bagby said.

"Those individuals that are chosen can be counted upon to do the right thing, to make the right vote," he said.

Problems with the Electoral College system can arise when parties encounter so-called faithless electors — when an elector decides to vote against the candidate to which he once pledged his loyalty. Some states have passed faithless-elector laws to guard against such practices, Michie said, but a majority of Electoral College members are free to vote as they wish.

The faithless elector is a rare occurrence, however.

"The electors tend to vote the way the majority votes," Michie said.

Even though the official word on the president of the United States won't come for two months, citizens' votes are important in all areas, Unekis said. Local races also are in need of attention on Tuesday.

"There are House seats and gubernatorial races — there are other reasons to turn out for state elections," Unekis said.

see their vote as invaluable.

"The state of Kansas is Republican, so no matter what, George W. Bush will get the Kansas vote," Parks said, "and people think if they vote any other way, their vote can not possibly make an impact."

Nader needs to receive 5 percent of the vote in this year's election in order to receive future funding for the Green Party. It will then be recognized as a third party.

Leahy said by voting for Nader in this year's election, he will then be able to run on the Green ticket for future elections.

"This also helps other Green Party candidates, senators and such to run on their own party ticket, instead of being labeled an independent," Leahy said.

Parks said voters should cast their ballots for Nader.

"You will be voting your conscience and what you believe," Parks said.

The Green Party vote is the only one that will make a difference in Kansas, Wiesner said.

"Bush will automatically get Kansas, and Gore has no chance, so voting for Nader is the right thing to do," Wiesner said. "It gives a chance for more ideas to be presented to the American people."

New database helps improve content online

The Collegian is trying to not only improve its print edition, but it is also attempting to go above and beyond in its online version.

At www.kstatecollegian.com, things are starting to happen. For the first time since the Electronic Collegian hit the Web in 1994, there is a complete change in the production of the the news online.

Earlier this year, the Collegian signed a partnership with Campus Engine, a provider of online publishing tools and advertising to many similar online campus newspapers.

Until now, we have had changes that revolve around banner advertising and different services offered online.

This has been the build up to what we have now — a completely different way of preparing, storing and presenting the content of the online Collegian. This method, a database system based on Campus Engine's publishing tool, is more efficient than our previous online system.

Our content will also be improved. For the national elections we are sending two teams — one reporter and one photographer per team — to cover the conventions of George W. Bush and Al Gore.

There will be election news coverage from now through Wednesday, not only in the print edition but some exclusive to the online edition. This is one of the many ways we are enhancing online coverage.

We have been adding video clips for our stories and now have included online polls and e-mail for our readers. Please let us know what you think, or if you have any additional ideas.

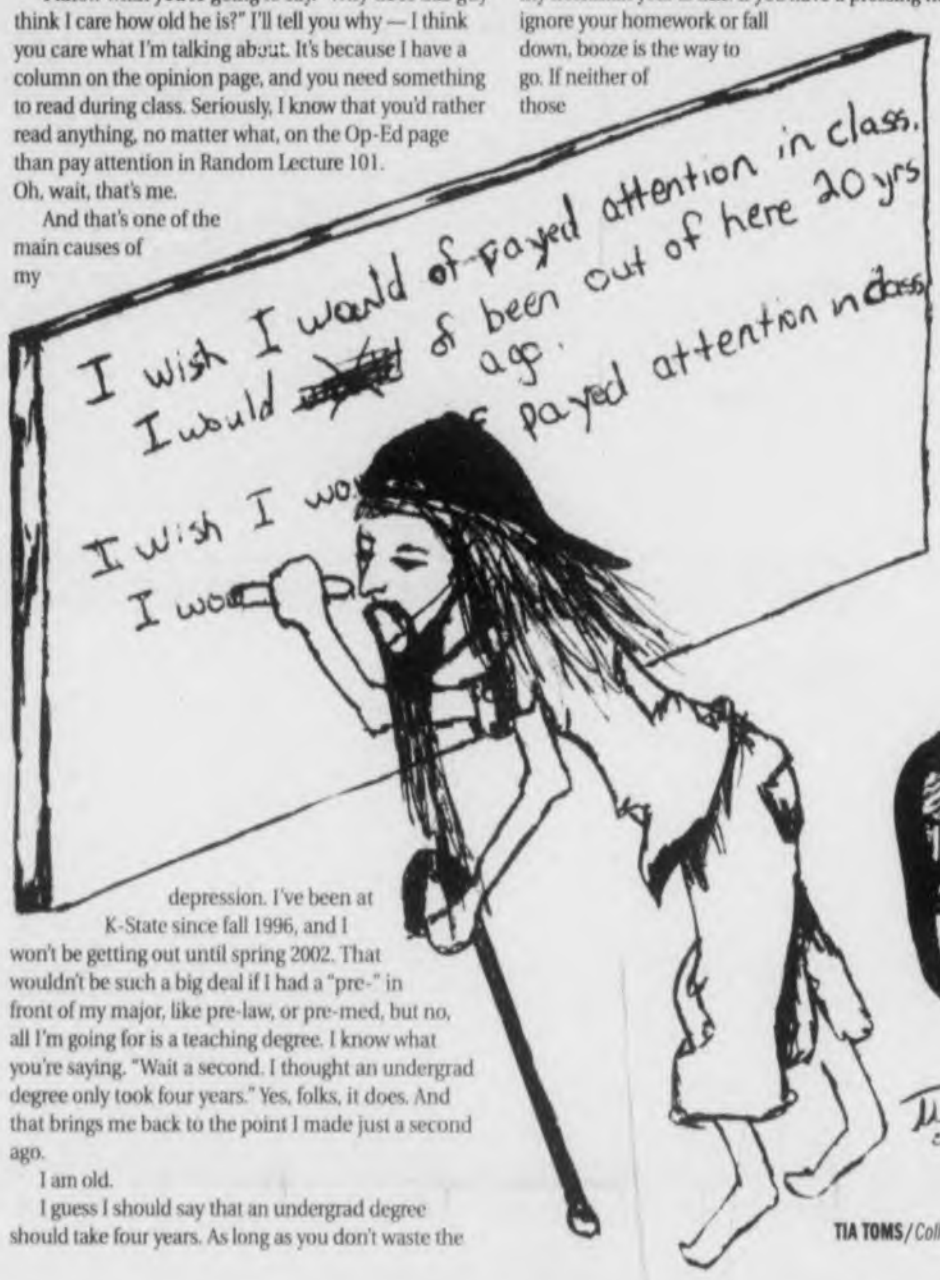
Aging undergrad admits regrets

Slacking-off on college education has lead to extended stay, high tuition

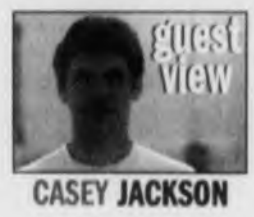
I am so old.



OK, technically, I'm not that old. As far as actual age, I'm only 22, so I guess I'm still pretty young. For example, that woman in France who turned 120 a few years ago — now that's old. Here's a general guideline: If you can remember Picasso as a young man, then you are very old. Now that I've said all that, I'd like to say that I still think I'm old.

I know what you're going to say. "Why does this guy think I care how old he is?" I'll tell you why — I think you care what I'm talking about. It's because I have a column on the opinion page, and you need something to read during class. Seriously, I know that you'd rather read anything, no matter what, on the Op-Ed page than pay attention in Random Lecture 101. Oh, wait, that's me.

And that's one of the main causes of my depression. I've been at K-State since fall 1996, and I won't be getting out until spring 2002. That wouldn't be such a big deal if I had a "pre-" in front of my major, like pre-law, or pre-med, but no, all I'm going for is a teaching degree. I know what you're saying. "Wait a second. I thought an undergrad degree only took four years." Yes, folks, it does. And that brings me back to the point I made just a second ago.



I am old.

I guess I should say that an undergrad degree should take four years. As long as you don't waste the first three (or so) by skipping class, reading the Collegian during class, doing the crossword during class, sleeping in class, etc. If you don't know yet, just trust me, these are all very, very bad when taken in large doses. I also spent a big part of my freshman year either drunk or hung over, and I can say with some certainty that nobody does better in their classes when they're under the influence. The lesson I learned during my freshman year is this: If you have a pressing need to ignore your homework or fall down, booze is the way to go. If neither of those things is high on your agenda, learn how to cut back.

TIA TOMS/Collegian

Another factor contributing to my extended stay here was my incredible inability to care about, well, anything pertaining to school. I have no idea what my problem was, but I actually have skipped tests. When I say tests, I mean it. I don't mean that I skipped one, learned my lesson, and never did it again. No, not me, sir. I always said to myself, "Well, since I'm not ready for this test, I'll just tell the teacher that I had some kind of car malfunction, and I'll take the test later, when I'm ready."

CASEY JACKSON

Here's the catch: Never, ever use the same excuse twice for one class. Teachers are a pretty wily bunch, after all, and I haven't met one yet who likes being lied to. For some reason, I also apparently thought that my homework had no effect on the final grade for the class. I must have thought that a three-hour class required three hours of work over the course of the semester, or something.

Fortunately, I've figured a few things out, and now I realize that teachers like it when you not only show up for class on a consistent basis but do some homework from time to time.

Anyway, like I said, I'm old, and I'm going to be here forever. People who were sophomores in high school when I was a senior are going to graduate at the same time I do.

Let's see, at $3,500/year for tuition and books, more than six years ... Holy crap! I'm spending more than $21,000 on a public university, and I'm not even going into something lucrative, such as architecture, or engineering. I guess the trade-off is that I get to see the sun year-round, but I'm still bitter.

Joe Hurla wrote a column last week about his impending graduation, which depressed the hell out of me, because Joe's graduating 1 1/2 years before me, and he's two years younger than I am. Joe must be smart. That, or he came here with the knowledge that going to class, doing your homework, and not skipping tests will make sure you leave before you're older than God.

Elections should not include Electoral College

The election process in this country is way off. Who am I to question the election process of the greatest nation in the world, you might ask? Well, I might be one of the most important people out there. I am a voter.

This election might be like flipping through the channels the day after the sweeps period ends. Reruns. Well, reruns from the last century, anyway. At least that is what this race has the potential of becoming.

You see, like the elections of 1824, 1876 and 1888, we might have a president in office whom the majority didn't want there. We might have a president who didn't win the popular vote, but received enough votes from the Electoral College to make the cut.

In 1824, the United States didn't have the "luxury" of a two-party system. There were four candidates on ballots in six of the 24 states. Six other states didn't even have elections; instead, their state legislatures choose electors. While Andrew Jackson received 38,149 more votes than John Quincy Adams, he didn't receive the majority of electoral votes. The U.S. House of Representative appointed Adams president. In 1876, Samuel Tilden pulled in 51 percent of the popular vote, but lost the Electoral College by just one. Rutherford B. Hayes won that race. In the 1888 campaign for the White House, Benjamin Harrison won the Electoral College even though Grover Cleveland won the popular vote by 0.8 percent. Cleveland was a full 90,000 votes ahead of Harrison.

The current election process also guarantees Americans only two parties to choose from, thus limiting the flow of new ideas into our government. In 1992 Ross Perot received more than 19.7 million votes but didn't garner one electoral vote. We could use independent parties, at the very least, to keep the Democrats and Republicans in check.

AMY CUNNINGHAM

In this day of technology, the Electoral College is maybe the most outdated and unnecessary invention of our forefathers. Here's how it works: as we place our votes Tuesday, we aren't necessarily voting for the president — we are voting for electors who will support their party's nominee.

Each state is given the same number of votes as the number of congressional districts it holds in addition to one more for each of the two U.S. senators.

In all states except Maine and Nebraska, whoever wins the state's popular vote takes all of the electoral votes. These states give two at-large votes to the winner of the popular vote but the remaining votes are placed for the winner in each congressional district. Not all states require their electors to follow the popular vote. As a matter of fact, a few of the remaining key battleground states fall into this category.

Electors will then gather in their respective state capitals on Dec. 18, where they will cast their votes for president. The votes will be tallied on Jan. 6 by the president of the Senate, Al Gore.

Gore is ahead of George W. Bush in states that are heavily populated, for example, New York and other East Coast states. However, Bush is strong in most Midwestern states with smaller populations. Some political analysts say it is conceivable that if Bush wins by a huge margin in the states he takes and Gore just squeaks by in his states, Bush just might win the popular vote.

The question is, can he pull in enough electoral votes to claim victory?

Americans, as a whole, are generally distrustful of our government. If we wind up with a president whom we didn't really want in the first place, where will that take us as a people? It only will serve to further weaken the esteem of the president as well as the role he serves.

During our nation's infancy, our forefathers did a wonderful job of framing our government, for the people, of the people and by the people. But is that really what our government has grown into today? If the popular vote isn't enough to win a presidency, then I'm not too sure it is.

Eliminating the Electoral College is the only way that we can solve this problem and prevent the less "popular" of the candidates from becoming president. With the technology available to us, votes could be electronically tallied almost instantaneously. The two-party system would become a thing of the past, thereby inviting smaller parties with new ideas into the arena of national politics. The most popular candidate would take office. More Americans would vote because they would know that their votes really did count. Presidential candidates would have to work to earn our votes. Government would become quicker to respond to the people who it is supposed to represent. Voters realize that they are important. Voters finally win.

Column's argument against proposed center inaccurate

Editor,

Joe Hurla's factually inaccurate and poorly thought-out column regarding the proposed student activities center does no credit to him or other opponents of the center. Rather than present intelligent arguments against the center, Hurla gives us a rant that makes one wonder if he bothered to do any research at all regarding this issue.

Hurla even manages to try to cast this vote as yet another skirmish in the fictional conflict between greeks and independents on this campus. It's appropriate that Hurla is trying to drive a wedge in the K-State community in order to defeat a measure that seeks to bring it closer together.

Student Senate and the Senate Operations Committee decided to open only one polling place in the K-State Student Union because the Union is the center of all student life on campus. Greeks and independents all use it: more than 17,000 come through the Union each day, only 5,000 short of our total enrollment.

While other locations were discussed, including the residence halls, it was decided that only the Union as a location offered the most unbiased and easiest access for the majority of students on campus.

Logistically speaking, it would be difficult to keep more than one polling place operating without risking the integrity of the voting. Online voting was considered but rejected because of time constraints and cost to students — something Hurla should appreciate.

Many student organizations do not need cubicle space. Their activities and programs do not necessitate that they have a place to store files, do paperwork or maintain a physical office space. However, there are also organizations that would benefit tremendously from this opportunity. There may be more than 120, but there won't be 330 of them. Many of those two-thirds "without a scrap from the table" aren't even going to apply for a cubicle space at all.

Hurla suggests that our student privilege fee money be spent in other places — including Hale Library (I'm assuming he means books and periodicals) and "more money for better teachers." Speaking as a student, I don't consider it a "privilege" to have books in the library or to have teachers for my classes. When I came to K-State, I expected both of those as rights.

Students support both of these through our tuition dollars. It is the university's responsibility, not ours, to make sure they are carried out. I would encourage every student to learn more about the proposed center throughout this week. Hurla speaks of a "mask" he accuses center proponents of trying to pull over the center. On the contrary, as has been reported in the Collegian, every effort is being made to inform students as to the details and possible benefits of such a center. This effort, however, is hurt by the mask of half-truths and inaccuracies that Hurla is trying to pull over students' eyes.

Motorsports club members participate in race

By DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

Under cloudy skies and a steady rain, drivers from around Kansas took to the track to test their driving abilities and their car's handling and agility in a race against time at the Raytheon Complex in Wichita on Sunday.

Driving on a make-shift course constructed on the company's parking lot, racers accelerated through straightaways, maneuvered around cones and battled slick pavement for the last chance to gain points this year in the Wichita Region of the Sports Car Club of America.

Two members of K-State's Motorsports Club, Joe Silva, senior in animal science business, and John Dolecek, junior in mechanical engineering, have raced competitively all year, with Dolecek recording the 13th-fastest time in his class during the SCCA national championships in Topeka earlier in the season.

Silva, the owner of a Chevy Camaro, said he likes the thrill of the race. He said it's good because, without these races, his driving style would compel him to drive illegally.

"I do it because I've got the car, and I don't want to do anything illegal on the streets," Silva said. "There isn't anywhere you can go and really use your car to its limit, because you're never going to use your car to its limit on the streets without doing something really illegal."

Although the cars entered into the SCCA's races do not reach incredible speeds, danger still exists due to the course's demanding cone obstacles, but that danger is minimized, Dolecek said.

"There's really not a lot, there's always an element of risk with any kind of competition, but we do everything we can to try to minimize it," Dolecek said. "SCCA has certain rules and regulations we have to abide by."

MICHAEL YOUNG/Collegian

Dave Geis begins a run during Sunday's regional SCCA meeting at the Raytheon Complex in Wichita. Geis, racing a 7982 Morton Formula Vee, finished 13th with a lap best of 56.249 seconds.

Silva said courses with fewer cone obstacles demand more speed from their drivers, but cone-crazy courses like Raytheon's favored drivers with better maneuverability skills.

"It's not a full-on 100 mile-per-hour course; the top speed you're going to hit here is maybe 40," he said. "But on some courses you'll hit up to 65 or 70 miles per hour."

Mother Nature also played a part in the race's times on Sunday, forcing drivers to slow down around cones and decelerate earlier.

Silva said that in races such as Sunday's, drivers are forced to work with the weather because autocross races occur in all type of inclement weather.

"You have to adjust for it," Silva said. "But we'll drive in rain, sleet or snow."

SCCA races encourage speed and skill on the course, but off of it, irresponsible driving is neither condoned nor accepted, Wichita Region director Loren Williams said.

"It's pretty safe," Williams said. "If they want to carry their enthusiasm out onto the streets, we kind of frown upon that and we'll talk to them about it."

Silva agreed and said that the races, which happen each weekend from April to November, are enough for him.

"You're pretty much drained after the race," Silva said. "This is pretty much your release; you get it all out."

With this year's competition in the books, Dolecek, the team's president, is now dedicated to increasing numbers for the club and looking into the possibility of holding a regional race in Manhattan.

"I'd like to obviously get more membership, and I'd like to let everybody know that this type of race exists," Dolecek said. "We've looked into the idea of having one at Bramlage in their parking lot. We just have to fill out the paperwork before they will respond."

Interior architecture students working to build black-history monument

By LYNNE HERMANSEN
Kansas State Collegian

Each year, fourth-year students in interior architecture take on a large-scale project.

This year, they are working to build a monument that will commemorate black history.

Adam Stover, senior in interior architecture, is one of many students helping to design the Buck O'Neil Research and Education Center.

The center is part of the Negro Leagues Baseball Museum at 18th and Vine streets in Kansas City, Mo.

"This is one of the bigger projects that we have worked with," Stover said. "There are five floors, 30,000 square feet, which makes it a difficult task."

The space for the center has not been used in 30 years and formerly housed the league's players. During this time, segregation prevented the players from staying in general hotels.

"They were not welcome anywhere else," said Gwen Owen-Wilson, associate professor of interior architecture. "They couldn't stay where the white players stayed."

The Buck O'Neil Research and Education Center will honor Buck O'Neil, a former Kansas City Monarch's baseball player. The Negro Leagues Baseball Museum asked the Interior Architecture Department to assist in the project.

"They were looking for some help and were directed to us," Owen-Wilson said. "They contacted our department head Steve Murphy about a month ago, who then gave it to our studio coordinator, who then discussed with the faculty as to where it would fit best in our curriculum."

Owen-Wilson said they examined their program and found the project to be ideal for fourth-year studio students.

"We don't take all projects. We have to sort them out to find which ones are appropriate for our students," Owen-Wilson said.

The students created design proposals that will be used by the museum staff and the Future Research Building staff. The center's needs were then examined.

"No one has an idea on how it should work, but they know what they need," Owen-Wilson said. "It's a great collaboration between their staff and our students."

Stover said the museum staff could not give any negative feedback on the design projects.

"They do not know what they want yet, so it's been mainly positive criticism," Stover said.

On Saturday, O'Neil and two other staff members from the museum came to review the student designs for the first time and to interact with them.

The museum will review the student's program document as part of the final review presentation on Dec. 2.

The students traveled to Kansas City to become acquainted with the space, Owen-Wilson said.

"Part of the education process in a design profession is going through this process," Owen-Wilson said. "The students are able to interact with the owners of the building. It's a learning experience in a professional program."

Owen-Wilson said fourth-year studio students always work with a real project.

"They have the chance to work with the realities of a existing building, whereas they could manipulate the projects for a non-existent building, " she said. "A real building is not flexible, they have to work with what is given to them."

Stover said the project is challenging to students because of the amount of space the building has.

"There's a lot more space to work with, and not all of us are used to working with so much space," Stover said.

Owen-Wilson said the project is a great opportunity for the students.

"It gives us exposure statewide, perhaps more then that," Owen-Wilson said.

The museum is using the students' design projects in an effort to raise funding for the building.

"It shows the public that this is what the building could possibly look like, and this is what it can be," Stover said. "It's exciting, because this is a project that is actually going to be done, raise money and use our projects."

Mayor Karen McCulloh makes the closing remarks at the Mayor's Hunger Experience Dinner 2000 on Sunday in the K-State Union Main Ballroom.

The dinner is just one of a series of events scheduled to raise money and food for needy families. Mayor Karen McCulloh said she enjoys the event because it raises awareness.

"We send out many invitations for the event, and even if people aren't able to come, they see that the mayor's holiday activities are beginning and it is time to get involved," she said. "People really do go the extra mile for these activities."

Instead of a keynote speaker at the dinner this year, there was entertainment in the form of various musical acts for the audience. A preview of Manhattan High School's production of "Guys and Dolls" as well as a preview of K-State's production of "A Funny Thing Happened on the way to the Forum" held the audience's attention throughout the dinner.

Despite the light atmosphere of the event, materials as well as a prayer at the end of the meal reminded attendees of the seriousness of raising money and food for the needy.

Leigh Ann Boeckman, junior in psychology, said she felt the dinner is a good tradition that encourages people to help out.

"Looking at the statistics of how many people the organization has assisted helps a lot," she said. "You don't normally see how many hungry people there are in Manhattan, and this really opens people's eyes and shows how much help is needed."

Bramhall said the generosity of volunteers and donations keeps the Flint Hills Breadbasket running, and she appreciates the help. Without the assistance of the public, the organization wouldn't be possible, she said.

"I can't really take all the credit for this," she said. "All I do is coordinate. It's the community that makes it happen."

Raising people's awareness is a big step in getting them involved, and this event does it very well by pointing out how some go hungry while others have plenty, McCulloh said.

"I have long been concerned with making sure that everyone who lives in this community has the best quality of life that I can make happen through public service," she said.

Speaker touts financial planning

By JJ DUNCAN
Kansas State Collegian

Planning for the future financially, a topic with applications for college students, was the subject of a lecture given on Friday by a renowned financial consultant.

Ed Morrow, the president of the International Association of Registered Financial Consultants, spoke to an audience in Union Forum Hall about the importance of having a financial consultant and the benefits of being a registered financial consultant.

Morrow said hiring a consultant can benefit a client because it is difficult to understand all the things that affect the choices a consultant makes.

"The consumer that is looking for a comprehensive financial planner wants to find someone with a higher level of education," he said. "Just like we hire someone to work on our cars or practice surgery on our brains, it takes that level of expertise in financial consultation to optimize your benefits because of how complicated modern economics are."

The Future Financial Planners Organization brought Morrow to K-State after members met him in New York at the American Express Financial Advisors Invitational Competition. The annual competition is set up to recognize the most qualified financial planning students in the country.

K-State's team finished first out of the six who made it to the finals, which resulted in a $10,000 grant for the program, said Angie Herbers, president of the Future Financial Planners Organization.

Herbers, a senior in financial planning, said bringing Morrow to campus was beneficial because it gave students a chance to speak with those working in the field.

"We brought Ed on campus to help unify our practitioner community and the university," she said. "We feel that there is a lot we can learn by bringing the practitioners and the students together so the students can learn from those who are already in the field."

John Grable, assistant professor of family financial planning, said he feels part of the reason why K-State's team won the competition is because of the emphasis the university's program puts on dealing with people.

This is why the family financial planning major is in the School of Family Studies and Human Services instead of a branch more dedicated to business, he said.

"I think there are two arms to financial consultation," Grable said. "There is financial planning, and there is also consultation where you need to connect with individuals to find what is best for them."

Finding the right decision for each client is an important aspect of financial consultation, Morrow said.

He said he was impressed with K-State's program and would recommend students to consider the field of financial consultation because there are many opportunities for students and they are able to truly help people.

Many have the misconception that if a consultant is older, they are better, but in actuality there are students graduating from K-State who are ready to take on the job, he said. Still, the consultant should be certified.

"The credentialing that the IARFC provides is a way to recognize people entering financial services who have really had a superb education and are ready to serve the public," he said.

"The public wants to do business with a qualified advisor and that qualification is not a function of age, its a function of training, education and experience."

SPEAKER

do this through the integration of knowledge throughout all academic disciplines."

Other speakers included Matthew Riggs, a "Green Elvis" impersonator who educates people through song and dance, and Carol Weisman, president of Board Builders Inc., who specializes in volunteerism and fund-raising.

Sandy Chandler, member of the conference planning committee, said they expected the conference to raise $3,000-$4,000 for KACEE.

"Not only are people getting educated at the conference, but the money that they are paying is going directly back into environmental education," she said.

CONFIDENCE BOOST

Team morale lifted with 56-10 victory

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

Head coach Bill Snyder said regaining full confidence is no easy task.

With the losses to Oklahoma and Texas A&M this season, the Cats' field general said his team might not have had complete contingency and assurance within themselves.

But it was enough to win Saturday, as Snyder's No. 16/11 Wildcats (8-2, 4-2) trounced unranked Iowa State (6-3, 3-3) 56-10 in front of 50,114 at KSU Stadium.

"I couldn't honestly tell you that everybody in our program was full confidence. Was anybody beyond the brink? Obviously, the answer to the question is no," Snyder said.

"And sometimes you look at confidence, and I think sometimes it can be confused with some other things, with tremendous disappointment, the anger, the adverse situations of losing a couple of ball games when you're really unaccustomed to doing that.

"Expectations for these young people were so extremely high, and not just on the outside, but within as well. I'm not telling you that everybody was still bubbling over with confidence — that probably wasn't the case — but I think it was probably a mixture of those things as much as anything. And for some people, one might be confused with the other."

That confusion bothered wide-out Quincy Morgan, as he said far too many people were doubting the Cats after losses to the Sooners and Aggies.

"Even though we lost, we knew our season wasn't over," he said Saturday. "A lot of people thought that we cashed it in, but that's not the case. We're still going to come out and play hard K-State football, which we did today."

However, Snyder said shaken confidence was never an issue for him.

"Listen, I've been shot at and hit with every bullet out there," he said, "so I've been here before — been here and done that."

And the Cats looked as if they'd been there and done that as well, jumping out to an early lead, much like what K-State had been accustomed to earlier this year, Snyder said.

"At least this season, it was a trademark for us to be the kind of football team that got started on the right foot," he said. "That was true for the first six ball games, and then we faltered a little bit. Today, it got us back on track in that respect."

Back on track the Cats were, marching 67 yards in seven plays on their opening drive, capped by Josh Scobey's TD plunge from two yards out.

That score was possible thanks to a key third-down conversion, Snyder said. On third-and-10 from the Cats' 33-yard line, quarterback Jonathan Beasley scrambled to elude Cyclone pressure and found Rock Cartwright on the sideline for 21 yards.

"That could be as big of a play as there was in the ball game, at least that was in our favor," Snyder said. "We finished the drive with seven points, and if you don't get that catch or don't get that throw, then you don't have those points.

"How does that impact the second drive? No one knows. But after you get seven on the first one, it makes it a little easier on the second one."

Apparently, it was easier.

After a Carl Gomez 30-yard field goal for the Cyclones, Scobey finished K-State's next drive, covering 64 yards in four plays, by pummeling in for a one-yard TD and giving the Cats a 14-3 lead.

Scobey added another rushing score with 1:21 remaining to make K-State a perfect 4-for-4 on scoring drives in the first quarter, and both Chris Claybon and Morgan followed with TDs in the second stanza as K-State led 35-3 at halftime.

Nevertheless, the Cats would not surrender that lead, as the Cyclones did to K-State last season in Ames. In 1999, Iowa State led by 21 points at the intermission, before the Cats stormed back to claim victory 35-28.

"That's obviously something that you would remind your football team of, in the fact that they outscored us 28-7 in the first half in the ball game last year," Snyder said. "And it was important for us to get a good start in the third quarter, which by and large, offensively, we didn't do."

Despite the three-and-out to start the second half, K-State would use TD runs by Beasley and Scobey in the period, as well as a fourth-quarter

Highly ranked Big 12 offense shut down by Wildcats

KELLY GLASSCOCK/Collegian

Monty Beisel takes down Iowa State's quarterback Sage Rosenfels for a loss of six yards. The Cats will play Nebraska at 6 p.m. Saturday at KSU Stadium.

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

Linebacker Ben Leber said Saturday was his type of defensive football game.

"This was how we like to play and what we always knew we were capable of playing," he said. "It was great to stop them on three-and-outs and go sit down and watch the offense just pound the ball. It was fun."

However, Leber said shutting down quarterback Sage Rosenfels and Iowa State wasn't as easy as it looked, regardless of the statistics.

K-State held the Cyclones, the third-best team in the Big 12 in total offense (427.8 yards/game), to 291 yards on the afternoon, including just 22 yards and one first down in the second and third quarters combined.

The Cats also limited Iowa State and tailback Ennis Haywood to 80 yards rushing, despite the Cyclones averaging more than 200 yards per game this season on the ground, second in the conference to Nebraska.

Head coach Bill Snyder said he was pleased with the way the defense handled the difficult assignment of slowing down a high-powered ISU offense.

"Well, it's never an easy task, let's put it that way. They had less than 100 yards rushing — I think that was a great effort. Part of that was because they fell behind so far. We've been in that situation before and obviously have to throw it a little bit more — that takes away a little bit of the balance out of your offense," he said.

"They got a little over 200 yards passing, but I still think we did a nice job with the exception of a few isolated cases in which we broke down in coverage. But outside that, I thought we did a nice job in defending against the pass as well."

That satisfaction in the Cats' defensive efforts against the Cyclones also was Offensive game improves against Cyclones

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

KELLY GLASSCOCK/Collegian

Rashad Washington is pulled down by three Iowa State defenders in the fourth quarter of Saturday's game. K-State won the game 56-10.

K-State put together a complete offensive performance for the first time in four games.

The Cats' 583 yards of total offense was the fourth-best in school history, and their 367 yards rushing was the most since K-State posted 429 yards on the ground against Bowling Green in 1997.

And it was about time, wide receiver Quincy Morgan said.

"A lot of people said we couldn't do it, and we weren't getting it done, and we wanted, for ourselves, to show people that we can still get it done," he said.

Execution was the reason the Cats got it done this week, offensive coordinator Ron Hudson said.

"It was better execution. We didn't drop any balls, we didn't throw any interceptions," he said Saturday. "The fundamentals of the game was really the biggest difference today."

The Cats did indeed improve their fundamentals, a fact implied by the absence of turnovers and dropped passes.

However, the way K-State started its first drive gave reason to doubt that change, as the Cats had two false start penalties on their first four plays.

K-State started the same way at Texas A&M, but this time the Cats executed to overcome the penalties, Hudson said.

"I'm sitting in the press box, and I'm saying, 'Good Lord, we've been through this, and here we are again, in our own house, and there's not a noise problem,'" he said. "That's what happened at A&M, and even against Texas Tech — we had four there — so the fact that we were able to convert those plays and punch them in like we did really was gratifying."

Also gratifying for K-State was its ability to run the ball. In their previous three games, the Cats had only averaged 129 yards rushing, far below their weekly goal of 200.

Against Iowa State, K-State nearly tripled that number, and as a result, the entire offense was more effective, tailback Josh Scobey said.

"We wanted to get our running game going, and that's something we haven't been doing for the last three weeks. We have great receivers, we have a great passing game — we feel like they complete any time," he said. "But to make our offense complete, we wanted to get our running game going today, and that's something we did."

"We didn't drop any balls, we didn't throw any interceptions. The fundamentals of the game was really the greatest difference today."

Ron Hudson, offensive coordinator

To get the running game going again, the Cats put the ball into the hands of Scobey, and the move paid off as he ran the ball for 149 yards on 19 carries. Yet, most of the success was due to the offensive line that opened up his running lanes, Scobey said.

"I like to get behind my offensive line and let them lead the way as they did today. I credit them always because they make it happen," he said. "If one of them misses their block, then the play is busted. But if all of them are going downhill, getting their blocks, there's a good chance it could go all the way or can go for a great amount of yards.

"When you establish that you've got some hogs up front, and they're going to play today, it's going to be a long day, because they're coming all day and they're going to be running at you all day. When they're up front taking care of business, everything works out good."

Scobey's appreciation for his blockers is reciprocated, too. Scobey hit the holes well, and then thanked his lineman, offensive guard Andy Eby said.

"When you see a guy hitting a hole like Josh was today, you get real excited because you're going to make some yards, you're going to move the chains. It's real exciting when Josh gets in the huddle because you can tell that he wants to get the ball and run down field with it," he said.

"He brings everything — he brings power, speed, motivation. When we give him good blocks, he's always congratulating us."

Once the running game started rolling, K-State's passing attack also came to life. Quarterback Jonathan Beasley was 11 for 15 for 181 yards, and Morgan caught the ball six times for 137 yards.

Earlier last week, head coach Bill Snyder talked about taking pressure off of Beasley by relieving him of some his audible responsibilities. On Saturday, however, Beasley just played up to his personal expectations, Snyder said.

"I think he played very well, and in all honesty, he approached this game just exactly as he has every other one," he said. "When we say take the pressure off of him, we were prepared to do exactly that, and he accepted the responsibility that he has always accepted, and we went with it."

Massive margins

K-State's 46-point win over Iowa State is the third-biggest margin of victory over a conference opponent. The Wildcats' 66-0 shutout of Missouri in 1999 tops the list, followed by a 54-6 win over Kansas two seasons ago. In addition, the Cats' 56 points marks the third most against a conference foe, posting 66 last year against the Tigers and 59 vs. Oklahoma in 1969. K-State has also scored 30 or more points by halftime in six of 10 games this season.

Century mark

With 367 yards rushing against the Cyclones, K-State has rushed for at least 100 yards in 10 straight games. The Cats' yardage on the ground is the most since the team reeled off 429 rushing yards against Bowling Green in 1997.

Offensive explosion

K-State's 583 yards of total offense is the fourth most in school history, including the most against a conference opponent. The yardage surpasses the team's previous season best of 514 yards against Ball State.

Scoop on Scobey

Community-college transfer Josh Scobey posted a career rushing effort, setting personal highs of 19 carries, 149 yards and four touchdowns. He became the first 100-yard rusher since Chris Claybon against Louisiana Tech (21 attempts for 121 yards) earlier this season. His yards are the most by a Wildcat since Joe Hall's 195 against Utah State in 1999, and the most against a conference opponent since Michael Bishop posted 196 vs. Missouri in 1997.

TD trend

With four touchdowns, Scobey tied the school record for most TDs by a running back, a feat equaled by both Pat Jackson (1990, vs. New Mexico State) and Bill Butler (1971, vs. Oklahoma). Scobey has now scored at least one touchdown in seven of K-State's 10 games, tallying two or more scores in four of those contests.

Closing in

David Allen's 12 punt return yards against Iowa State leaves him just 66 shy of tying the NCAA career punt-return record of 1,695 yards, held for more than 50 years by Lee Nalley of Vanderbilt (1947-49).

Moving up

Jonathan Beasley's 29-yard TD strike to Quincy Morgan in the second quarter makes him just the third Cat QB to throw for 30 touchdowns in a career, joining Bishop (1997-98) and Chad May (1993-94). The catch was also Morgan's 20th career TD reception, leaving him only six behind all-time leader Kevin Lockett (1993-96).

Cooper sidelined

Strong safety Jarrod Cooper didn't see action against Iowa State. Defensive coordinator Phil Bennett declined comment on the reasons for Cooper's absence, and head coach Bill Snyder said the matter was "family business."

The New Femme Fatales

Lack of plot fails to hinder big-screen fun of 'Charlie's Angels'

Review by CORBIN H. CRABLE
Kansas State Collegian

These aren't the Charlie's Angels of your parents' era.

In a remake of the 1970s TV show, the movie, "Charlie's Angels," is low on plot but high in laughs and action.

Cameron Diaz, Drew Barrymore and Lucy Liu star as the femme fatales and are teamed with a new Bosley (Bill Murray) to keep some important information from falling into the wrong hands.

Like I said, the plot leaves much to be desired.

However, the movie will appeal to a range of audience members. Everyone who ever had a Farrah Fawcett poster in their rooms as a teen-ager in the 1970s will flock to this movie for its nostalgic value. And for the men of all ages, there's not only the action, but also Diaz's butt, Barrymore's cleavage and Liu's dominatrix attitude to keep you begging for more.

I was disappointed to find Tom Green stuck in the movie. The only reason he even got a role was because of his relationship with Barrymore. He seems out of place in the movie, and is just unfunny. The only way his career will advance is through Barrymore, and this is proof.

Some of you, though, might recognize the dastardly villain as Crispin Glover, who played the nerdy George McFly in "Back to the Future."

I've always been a fan of Glover's acting, and he slips into the villain role with an uncanny ease, a far cry from his previous roles.

What makes this movie so cheesy and lovable is the fact that anytime there's an opportunity, the camera captures a butt shot, or something of the like.

It's almost a subliminal message — there could be a dialogue between two characters, the camera then goes to a shot of Diaz's caboose, and then back to the dialogue, as if to break the monotony of the inconvenient thing we call conversation. But hey, whatever works.

With an incredible soundtrack to match (including the hit "Independent Women" by Destiny's Child), "Charlie's Angels" will attract moviegoers of all ages and for various reasons.

You can go for the nostalgia, but admit it, you'll probably stay for the gratuitous butt and cleavage shots.

Aguilera disappoints with insipid holiday album

Review by REED DUNN
Kansas State Collegian

Even with a couple of No. 1 hits and a Grammy under her belt, Christina Aguilera was not prepared to release a Christmas album this early in her career.

"My Kind of Christmas" is something that should have been recorded and released after Aguilera proves herself as more than a passing trend.

Aguilera's incredible vocal talents did allow her to cut some nice traditional Christmas songs such as "Have Yourself a Merry Little Christmas," "Oh Holy Night" and "The Christmas Song." A few favorites are not what makes a great Christmas album, though.

The original work on the album is nothing to be used as a complement to these favorites. In fact, the rest of the album is much less impressive than anything Aguilera has released or probably ever will release.

She evidently idolizes Mariah Carey, but trying to copy the sounds of Carey's Christmas album is something Aguilera was not able to pull together.

"Christmas Time," the first song on Aguilera's release, is similar to something that could be found on Carey's "Merry Christmas" album, but the strong vocals are drowned out by instrumental and background noise.

"Xtina's Xmas" is another example of less-than-decent work. The song is something of a short dance mix, and has nothing to offer. Perhaps the song was added as a space filler to give the album an appropriate number of tracks.

"Xtina's Xmas" was followed by a remix version of "The Christmas Song," which is also a bad idea for space filler. A quality Christmas album has no room for remixes of popular holiday tunes.

If Aguilera wanted to produce a good holiday gift for her fans, she should have continued to listen to Carey and other comparable artists who have had continuous successes with their holiday releases.

Receiving this album, even for an Aguilera fan, would be like getting a lump of coal in your stocking.

Huskers next test for Wildcats

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

Defensive coordinator Phil Bennett said K-State had a battle cry all week after its 26-10 loss to Texas A&M.

"When you're in the situation we were in last week, and sort of since the Oklahoma game, you've got to do two things," he said. "You're either going to fold your tent, or you're going to fight."

The Cats decided to fight Saturday, defeating Iowa State 56-10 at KSU Stadium.

However, head coach Bill Snyder said he is not quite sure if K-State's efforts against the Cyclones are good enough to beat Nebraska this weekend at KSU Stadium.

"I don't know that it would. We're going to have to be awfully good to have that opportunity," he said. "Nebraska's a frightening football team sometimes. We struggled against Texas Tech, and I watched their ball game against Texas Tech and it was some kind of performance."

With the Huskers' 56-3 victory over the Red Raiders on Oct. 14 in mind, linebacker Ben Leber echoed Snyder's sentiments after the Cats' win over Iowa State.

"I don't know. Obviously we're just going to have to play our best game of the season to beat Nebraska, and this a great stepping stone," he said. "So we'll see next week."

This Saturday, K-State will be pitted against a No. 4/5 Cornhusker team that bounced back from it's 31-14 loss to Oklahoma with a 56-17 shellacking of Kansas in Lincoln.

In that game, NU quarterback Eric Crouch ran for 127 yards and four touchdowns, becoming the top-rushing QB in Nebraska history with 2,152 yards on the ground.

Crouch was one of three Huskers with at least 100 yards rushing against the Jayhawks, as NU racked up 493 yards on 73 carries for the day.

Yet, Snyder said the Cats' win over the Cyclones was the kind of victory the team needed heading into Nebraska.

"Considering the alternatives, it was monumental," he said. "I think the way that we won the ball game was extremely important to this football team."

It was especially important to Jonathan Beasley, as the Cat QB said the team needed a game it could build upon this week.

"It helps out knowing that we've got the confidence of everyone — special teams, offense and defense," he said. "We know we're going to have to pick it up another level against Nebraska coming in, but this was a great confidence booster for us."

That boost was partially attributed to the Cats' increased emotional level in preparation for the Iowa State contest, Snyder said.

"It's not just a matter of getting up for a ball game — that's one thing. But there's a question of spirit and confidence, and an awful lot of questions that need to be addressed and hopefully solved," he said. "And I can't guarantee that we solved every single one of them.

"I can just tell you that I was proud with the way the week culminated with this group of people. It culminated today, but I'm proud of their efforts in the latter stages of this week. They prepared themselves well, emotionally, as well as physically and mentally."

That said, Bennett said he believes the Wildcats will hold their destiny in their hands this weekend.

"I'm not worried about Nebraska. I'm worried about us," he said. "We held (Iowa State) to 2-of-15 on third down conversions, changed some things up, but I thought our kids played with great confidence and they felt like they had something to prove — not to anybody, but ourselves. And I think as coaches, I felt I had something to prove."

Bennett said the coaching staff's need to prove itself was extremely important in getting the team back on track.

"Emotionally with football teams, you're dealing with 18-to 22-year-old kids, and you never know how they're going to react to any situation. But as I said last week, I really believe that players respond the way their coaches do," Bennett said. "And I think Coach Snyder has done a wonderful job of being even-keeled.

"We could've gone in, we could've worked longer, we could've beat 'em up, but we didn't do that. We stayed on schedule, we cut the level base and our players responded to that. Now, did we pick up a sense of urgency in practice? Without question."

Although that urgency could still linger this week, Bennett said even Iowa State wide-out J.J. Moses is pulling for the Cats this weekend against the Huskers.

"After the game, I talked to one of their little receivers and he said, 'You all need to get Nebraska.' And I took that as a compliment to our players."

DEFENSE

displayed by defensive coordinator Phil Bennett, although there's still room for improvement, he said.

"They were a very good offense, and as I told the kids, to do what we did against that offense after watching them all their games, I was very proud of them," Bennett said. "But it could've been a lot better, of course — they think I'm always constantly saying that, but it could've been one of those real, real good days."

But watching hours of Iowa State game film did pay off, even if it did elicit a little anxiety, Snyder said.

"We looked at every ball game that they played. The one that sticks out in my mind more than anything else was the Nebraska game," he said. "I thought Sage Rosenfels wore them out. He did really a nice job against them and threw the ball extremely well, so I was frightened to death.

"I saw him make some uncanny throws. It didn't make any difference whether it was Nebraska's people or anybody else — it was going to be hard to cover some of the throws that he made in that ball game."

But the Wildcat secondary did just that, as K-State prevented Rosenfels' from connecting with his favorite target, wide-out J.J. Moses.

The 5-foot, 6-inch flanker, who ranked second in receiving in the Big 12, could only muster three catches for 34 yards Saturday.

"We wanted to take Moses out of the game, and for the most part we did that," Bennett said. "And the things we were doing, we were forcing (Rosenfels) to throw the ball at different places where we felt we had better matchups than he did."

Iowa State head coach Dan McCarney commended the Cat defensive backs for their pass coverage.

"We didn't get open like we normally can, we didn't make the plays we normally can, and I believe that is one of the better defenses in all of college football," he said.

Yet, Bennett said he wouldn't characterize K-State's defense as dominating against the Cyclones, despite the statistics.

"I told somebody this and I told the kids this — this is a weird year in football. We're still the No. 1 defense in the Big 12, and that's something that we all take pride in," Bennett said. "And there's a lot of teams, after you play Oklahoma, Texas Tech — even KU with their offense — that wouldn't be in that situation."

score by wide-out Brandon Clark, to break away from the Cyclones.

Yet, Snyder was unsure whether the victory was, in fact, the cure to the Cats' ailments the past three weeks.

"Well, it's better than what the alternatives are, I assure you that," he said.

"I was pleased with the way our youngsters played most of the ball game, particularly the way they got themselves on the field in the first half."

However, that success came at no surprise to Iowa State head coach Dan McCarney.

"Other than one week of the season, they've been in the Top 10 all season long, and they sure looked like it today. They jumped all over us early in the game, and they pretty much had their way with Iowa State today," McCarney said Saturday. "I really respect the program Bill has here and the team that he has.

"No question that's one of the top teams in college football that I've seen this year — that I've coached against or seen on tape."

Gaza Strip, West Bank violence leaves 2 dead, 17 injured

By GREG MYRE
The Associated Press

JERUSALEM — Scattered clashes Sunday across the Gaza Strip and West Bank left two Palestinians dead, 17 injured and tensions high despite a truce agreement and plans for upcoming meetings in Washington, D.C.

President Clinton, who has been trying to restore calm to the region, will be host to Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat on Thursday, and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak three days later, on Nov. 12, the White House said Sunday.

Both Palestinians killed Sunday were shot dead in the Gaza Strip. One was Maher Mouhmad Alsaidi, a 16-year-old boy hit in the head during a confrontation near the Al Bureij refugee camp, to Shifa hospital director Mouawia Hassanian said.

At least 10 Palestinians were wounded in Gaza, and seven were hurt in the West Bank in a clash outside Bethlehem, to the south of Jerusalem, Palestinian security forces said.

In the West Bank, two Jewish settlers, a man and a woman, were wounded when Palestinian assailants ambushed their car and opened fire, settler spokesmen said. The military command confirmed the shooting incident.

In a plea for peace, tens of thousands of Israelis filled a Tel Aviv square on Saturday night to pay tribute to former prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, who was assassinated at the site five years ago by an ultra-nationalist Israeli opposed to trading land for peace with the Palestinians.

Barak, on Sunday, told his Cabinet that the large turnout was "an impressive and emotional demonstration" of the Israeli commitment to peace.

"It's unfortunate that on the other side such a demonstration of the peace process could not occur," he said in a reference to the Palestinians.

In a speech at the Saturday rally, Barak warned Arafat that Israel "will not surrender to violence, and we will defend our civilians and Israeli soldiers everywhere."

The Israeli-Palestinian violence broke out more than five weeks ago, claiming 170 lives — the vast majority Palestinian — in the worst bloodshed since peace talks began in 1993.

Arafat accused Israel of not abiding by a cease-fire deal reached Thursday and said he wanted the United States to pressure it to comply.

"Israel was supposed to immediately lift the closures of Palestinian cities, lift the siege and reopen the (Gaza) airport. I'm sorry to say that until this minute the siege has not been lifted," he said Saturday.

Israeli officials also accused Arafat of moving slowly.

"We see the Palestinian police and security attempting to prevent (rioters) from reaching friction points," Brig. Gen. Yair Naveh, the commander of Israeli forces in Gaza, told army radio. But there was still much work to do, he said. "In other areas, which are more serious from our point of view, such as terrorist activity and shootings, we're still far from the goal we want to reach."

The violence has shown some signs of abating since the Israelis and Palestinians reached the truce Thursday. The sessions in Washington would give Clinton another chance to try to promote a settlement.

"The meetings are to assess the situation on the ground and begin to find a way back to negotiations," said White House spokesman Jake Siewert.

President vetoes bill making release of government secrets criminal

By DEB RIECHMANN
The Associated Press

NEW YORK — President Clinton on Saturday vetoed a bill that would have made criminal the leaking of government secrets.

The legislation, he said, might "chill legitimate activities that are at the heart of a democracy."

The proposal had drawn criticism from news organizations which said it would stifle their ability to obtain information vital to the public.

"We must never forget that the free flow of information is essential to a democratic society," Clinton said.

He cited the "badly flawed provision" as the reason he vetoed a bill that authorizes spending for the CIA, National Security Agency and other intelligence activities for the fiscal year that began Oct. 1.

The total intelligence budget is classified and is not made public, but is believed to be about $30 billion.

The president urged Congress "to pursue a more narrowly drawn provision tested in public hearings so that those they represent can also be heard on this important issue."

Rep. Porter Goss, R-Fla., chairman of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, said the administration did not express concerns about the provision in earlier negotiations.

"To veto this critical piece of legislation now is disruptive and may send a dangerous signal to those who would harm U.S. interests," Goss said.

The provision would have extended penalties that now exist for leaking classified, national defense information, to the leaking of other classified, but non-defense data that could harm the United States if made public or given to foreign governments.

Clinton said he agreed with congressional sponsors of the legislation that unauthorized disclosures of classified information "can be extraordinarily harmful to United States national security and that too many such disclosures occur."

"Those who disclose classified information inappropriately commit a gross breach of the public trust and may recklessly put our national security at risk," he said.

Clinton, however, said that in dispute was not the seriousness of the problem but the best way to respond to it.

"As president ... it is my responsibility to protect not only our government's vital information from improper disclosure but also to protect the rights of citizens to receive the information necessary for democracy to work," he said.

The president said it takes a careful balance to reconcile the goals of protecting national security and the public's right to know. "This legislation does not achieve the proper balance," Clinton said.

Campaign rallies attempt to sway undecided voters as Al Gore, George W. Bush prepare for election's home stretch

By NICK BRATKOVIC
Kansas State Collegian

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Speakers at the "Get Out the Vote" rally in Kansas City Monday said Missouri is a swing state that the Democratic Party needs to win in this presidential election.

"Word is out that we may be the state that makes a difference," Kansas City Mayor Kay Barnes said. "So call your friends and neighbors and offer to drive people who cannot make it on their own to the polls.

"Do whatever it takes, because the people in this room could truly make a difference."

One of the speakers at the rally was Kristen Gore, the vice president's daughter. Gore spoke to the crowd about her father's record as not only a public official, but as a father.

"My father has always stressed to us the value of public service," she said. "One of his favorite quotes is by Ghandi, and it's 'You must be the change you want to see in the world.'"

Gore said the quote was one her father has demonstrated to her throughout her life, including in his bid for the presidency. She said the idea of changing the world would carry over into the way her father would run the White House and the justices he would appoint to the Supreme Court.

"He will appoint Supreme Court justices that reflect all of our values," Gore said, referring to, among other issues, a woman's right to have an abortion.

In closing her remarks, Gore said the election was about two different men with different ideas. Gore then excited the audience when she said she had to go home and vote.

Joining Gore on the platform were a cast of celebrities, featuring actor/director Rob Reiner, actresses Julia Louise-Dreyfus and Alfre Woodard, along with actors Martin Sheen and Dule Hill.

The panel of stars praised Al Gore on the issues while they criticized George W. Bush's plans for the future. Reiner, who starred on the 1970s sitcom "All in the Family" and has directed movies such as "A Few Good Men" and "Sleepless in Seattle," denounced Bush's plans.

"George W. Bush's policies benefit the richest one percent," he said. "That's us, and we don't want it if it's going to hurt other programs."

Speakers at the event were also critical of Bush's stance on environmental issues. Catherine Fields, Jackson County attorney, praised Gore's environmental record.

"Of all the candidates who have ever run for the presidency, no candidate has ever done more in terms of protecting the environment," she said. "Certainly not a governor who has turned Houston into the smog capital of the United States."

The rally was open to the public, but it was mainly a message to a group of decided voters. Mary Anne Baier, a resident of Kansas City, Mo., said it was unfortunate the message could not be amplified to a

Opposing parties face off on streets of downtown K.C.

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Broadway Road was divided along party lines Monday.

Those attending the Democratic Party's "Get out the Vote" rally assembled on the left side of the street closest to the theater and held signs in support of Al Gore.

They chanted "Gore, Gore, Gore," and talked about his chances.

"I like the fact that he has targeted tax cuts to the middle class," said Brendan Buckley, a Kansas City, Mo., resident.

Another issue Democratic voters said they identified with were Gore's views on education. Keith Coulting, an electrician from Smithville, Mo., said he supports Gore's education package, which calls for a tax credit for college education.

"I like his stance on education, which supports a tax-credit for parents," he said. "He wants to put money into education."

Gore's plan would measure student and teacher accountability. It would also, according to his Web site, add

Manhattan voters assigned to specific polling locations

By NANCY HULL
Kansas State Collegian

Voters registered in Manhattan should have a stress-free Election Day if they can remember just one thing today — which polling place they have been assigned.

All of Manhattan's registered voters are assigned by location to one of 27 polling places within the city.

Riley County account clerk Sue Seitz, who trains the poll workers, said a common problem with elections occurs when people don't realize they can't vote at just any polling place.

QUESTIONS?

If you have questions about where to vote call the Riley County Clerk's office at 537-6300 or look online at www.kstatecollegian.com for a voting precinct map.

"The supervising judge at all locations can help guide voters to the right place," Seitz said.

James Isom, junior in engineering, said he registered to vote in Riley County but lost his voter registration card, which listed the designated polling places.

"I was just thinking that I could vote in the Union, but my roommates reminded me that I had to go somewhere else," Isom said. "I called the clerk's office to check where I'm supposed to go."

Another problem occurs when people think they're registered, but they're actually not, Seitz said. If people moved more than 30 days ago and haven't reregistered in Riley County, they can fill out a provisional ballot, Seitz said.

"We want everyone who wants to vote to be given the opportunity," she said.

Registered voters have the opportunity to vote today from 7 a.m. to 7 p.m. Jolene Campbell, deputy clerk for Riley County, said she would be happy if the voter turnout is close to the 73-percent turnout of 1996. 24,475 people are registered to vote in Manhattan, compared to the 20,751 registered in 1996.

"With the possibility of rain keeping voters away, I'd be happy with a 60- to 73-percent turnout," she said.

Advance voting in Riley County concluded Monday with 2,207 ballots cast in Riley County. This year's advance voting numbers are up from the estimated 1,800 in 1996.

Campbell said she hopes the advanced voting will prevent long lines at polling places, and she said lines might form in the morning, around noon and after 5 p.m. Most locations have four or five polling booths.

"Once people are at the polling place, they shouldn't have longer than a 15 to 20 minute wait," she said.

Three to five poll workers, including a supervising judge, clerks and other judges, will be at the locations to check people's names, addresses, ballots and to ensure voters do not discuss candidate issues or leave candidate information in booths.

Legally, voters are not required to bring anything with them to polling places, Campbell said.

"We ask that people just bring themselves and patience," she said.

Texans working overtime to prepare capital city for Bush's homecoming

By NANCY FOSTER
Kansas State Collegian

AUSTIN, Texas — Working 12 to 15 hour days is what Jim Rasmussen, owner of Lightning Stage and Labor, said he was getting used to.

"We've been here since Nov. 2," he said, "working even in the rain."

In front of the Capitol in Austin several large TV screens were set up with the Bush/Chency logo on them. They, along with media tents and walkways, surrounded the stage that Gov. George W. Bush will appear on in less than 24 hours. All of these projects are things Rasmussen said have kept him busy.

He and his crew from San Antonio, Texas, were in charge of helping to create the overall lighting for today's election party. The Capitol, lit with blue, red, green and purple, were a part of his duties, along with setting up the towers for the TV screens and adding lighting to the capitol's trees.

"I haven't seen anything like this since the Y2K showing," Rasmussen said, referring to the amount of lighting. "That was the last celebration of this size outside."

He said his company has been kept busy since its arrival in Austin, along with more than 100 people working on the event.

Cory Mason, Sarah Pearl and David Miller, of Time Magazine, take a break to eat in front of a stage Monday night in Austin, Texas. They were preparing for tonight's celebration.

STEVEN DEARINGER/ Collegian

"This couldn't be undertaken by one company," Rasmussen said. "It's a big deal."

When storm clouds headed toward Austin Sunday night, he said they had to work even harder, covering the speakers and computers before it began to rain.

"We were already prepared for it when it got here, but that was the event of the day," he said.

Reporters, videographers and photographers were among the night workers, doing last-minute updates on the setup.

"This is more of a media extravaganza than for the individual person," Rasmussen said.

He said he'd heard rumors that ZZ Top

Members of Alpha Phi Omega fraternity use week to provide community service

By ERIN DEHN
Kansas State Collegian

Alpha Phi Omega members are pulling up their sleeves this week for community service in light of the organization's National Service Week.

Members of the co-ed service fraternity across the nation will be providing community service around this year's theme, "Nurturing the Leaders of the Twenty-first Century."

K-State's Pi chapter is volunteering throughout the week at Wonder Workshop Children's Museum, 821 Poyntz Ave.

Wonder Workshop is a hands-on museum used by area schools and open to the public. It also provides after-school programs for about 250 students.

"Our exhibits are for exploring," Richard Pitts, director of Wonder Workshop, said. "We want adults as well as children to have fun."

APO members already volunteer at the museum Sundays, helping with organization and building exhibits.

"They do so many different things here," Pitts said. "I'm so glad to have them."

Because of their preexisting commitment to the museum, APO decided Wonder Workshop was the place to serve for National Service Week.

This week, APO will gear their work toward exhibits, restorations and programs, Pitts said. APO will put seasonal items in storage for winter and help brainstorm for new ideas.

"The children's museum is run by 90 percent volunteers," Pitts said, "so their work here is critical."

APO has provided helping hands to the museum for almost two years.

"They've been with us for a while," Pitts said. "And they've made a difference."

APO is celebrating its 75th anniversary nationally and has been a part of K-State since the late 1930s.

"Our organization is founded on the cardinal principles, leadership, friendship and service," President Drew Chance said.

The term "fraternity" sometimes deters women from joining, so APO members often use the word "organization," said Chance, senior in sociology.

"Alpha Phi Omega is the largest undergraduate organization in the United States," Chance said. "We solely work for service."

The organization participates in numerous philanthropic activities throughout the year such as working with the local boy scouts, trick-or-treating for canned food for the Flint Hills Breadbasket, tutoring, and cleaning along Carnahan Creek.

"Carnahan is always a good time," said Lydia Gwost, senior in biology and pledge trainer. "We usually bonfire afterwards. It's what you make of it."

Chance said APO is raising money for Pennies for Puppies, a program that trains seeing-eye dogs.

"Any ideas that come up, we look into," Chance said.

Along with volunteering, members visit other universities to attend conferences and workshops.

"It's a lot of fun to meet with other chapters," Chance said. "We network to help each other out."

Chance said what he enjoys most about being a member is the relationships gained through the work.

"The feeling of helping people out and the friendships you gain through service," he said.

Pledging has already begun for this semester, but students interested in getting involved can pledge next semester.

Don Wade, senior in construction science and management, said pledges go through a semester of pledgeship where they learn about the organization.

"I joined in 1995," Wade said. "It's a great

Emporia woman found murdered in Nebraska

ELKHORN, Neb. — A truck driver apparently killed a woman he met at a Kansas bar, then drove 200 miles to his Nebraska hometown where he dumped the body and killed himself, police said Monday.

Mitchell Witt, of Elkhorn, was found outside his truck, dead from a self-inflicted gunshot wound, Douglas County Sheriff Tim Dunning said. A note indicated "she" was in the sleeping compartment.

Inside the truck was Karen Jones, of Emporia, Kan. Her body was beaten and mutilated.

The bodies were found early Saturday. Based on trucking logs and other evidence, police believe Witt killed Jones in Emporia on Thursday, Dunning said.

Oz theme park proposal tabled by commission

OLATHE, Kan. — A proposed $860.5 million theme park and resort development based on the famed story of Oz was dealt a severe setback Monday as Johnson County commissioners were split on whether the plan should proceed.

The board's 2-2 vote effectively tabled the Wonderful World of Oz project indefinitely, with no assurances that commissioners would revisit the proposal later.

Before about 150 people at the Johnson County Administration Building in Olathe, the commissioners voted twice on whether to approve the project and once on whether to deny it. All three votes were 2-2.

Oz Entertainment Co. wanted to develop the former 9,065-acre Sunflower Army Ammunition Plant near DeSoto into a small community complete with the Disney-style theme park and resort complex.

Residents have shown up at county commission meetings to express their disapproval. Many fear the changes Oz could bring to the rural atmosphere of the bedroom community.

Others, including some business groups, believe it would boost the economy in DeSoto, which has seen inactivity at the plant for a decade.

The proposal calls for the federal government to transfer the land to the state through the Kansas Development Finance Authority, which could issue bonds to pay for the development. The finance authority would transfer the plant to Oz after approval by the county, state and federal government.

Target employees taken hostage in California

CULVER CITY, Calif. — Gunmen invaded a closed discount store early Monday and ordered nearly 60 employees to the floor at gunpoint in a botched robbery attempt, starting a standoff with police that ended peacefully about 2 1/2 hours later.

Two people were arrested, police said. No shots were fired and no one was injured.

Employees in the Target store on Sepulveda Boulevard notified police at 5:20 a.m. that there was a robbery in progress, said police Sgt. Lou Castle. The store normally opens at 8 a.m., but Culver City police said about 60 employees were already inside.

At daybreak, a group of about 15 people left the store and police ordered them to the ground.

"When these people exited the store we had an employee identify them. Three of them were detained," Castle said.

One of those three was released later.

The siege apparently ended around 7:45 a.m. when the remaining employees left the store with their hands in the air. One man in that group also was detained.

All three of those taken into custody were questioned at police headquarters. One was later released and two were booked, but the charges were not immediately disclosed.

Police said the two suspects had no weapons and officers were searching the store.

A Los Angeles County sheriff's special weapons team joined Culver City and Los Angeles police who surrounded the store.

Target corporate spokeswoman Patti Morris said crisis plans are in effect at all stores and the procedures were apparently followed during the Culver City robbery attempt. She wouldn't elaborate on those plans.

and George Strait had planned to entertain Tuesday's crowd, but had to cancel.

"I don't think they had enough money for production help," Rasmussen said. "And as you can see, we already have our hands full here. That would have added another dimension."

Sleeping isn't something Rasmussen will be able to do much of until the event is over, he said. After the ballots are counted and the results are announced, he said his work begins again.

At around 11:30 p.m., he and his crew will return to the scene in front of the capitol building to begin tearing everything down.

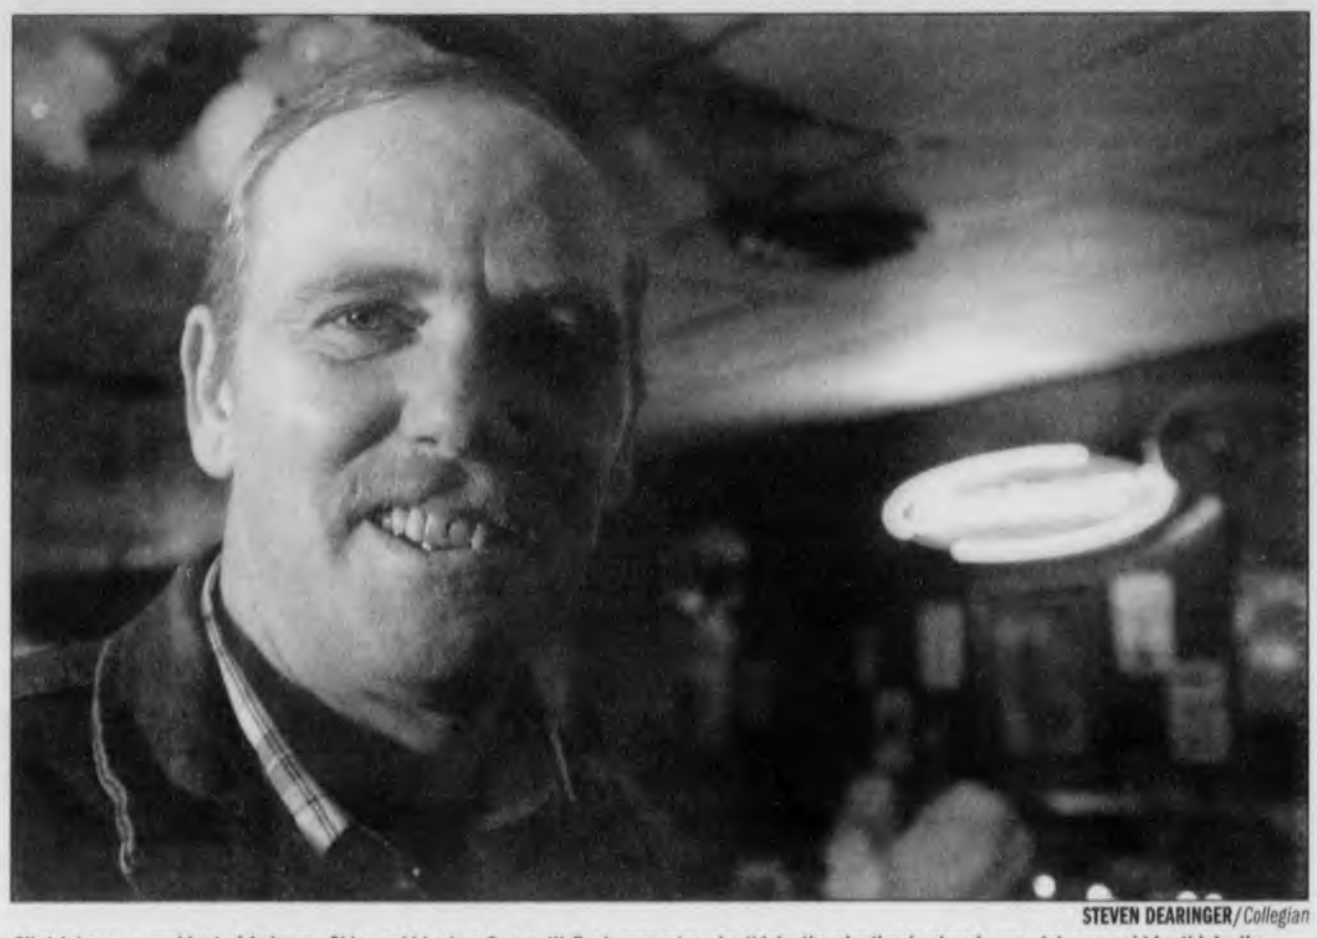
"We'll work until 11 in the morning tearing everything down, then sleep for about eight hours, and then come back for 15 hours. Then it will be like this never happened, except George Bush will be president then," he said with a chuckle.

Not only were crews working late, but so were Austin police officers.

Bruce Lutringer, motorcycle sergeant with the Austin Police Department, said the Republican Party paid for the officers to work overtime. So far, Lutringer said they hadn't encountered any problems.

"Austin's a pretty laid-back town," he said. "This will be a small party compared to what this town's used to."

He said on Halloween night, one street had over 100,000 people. People from all over the United States travel to Austin for Halloween night on 6th Street.



"This will be a mellower crowd," Lutringer said.

On New Year's, he said crowds reached upwards of 200,000, and that it still stayed relatively calm.

"This is just another party," Lutringer said.

Oklahoma residents share opinions on election

By NANCY FOSTER
Kansas State Collegian

STEVEN DEARINGER/Collegian

Clint Johnson, a resident of Ardmore, Okla., said he is a George W. Bush supporter who thinks the election is already won. Johnson said he thinks the town of Ardmore will be better off if Bush is elected the next president.

Rickety wooden panels and a bright yellow sign advertising Thursday-night karaoke adorn the outside of a small bar in downtown Ardmore, Okla. On the inside, it's dimly lit, and the atmosphere resembles a scene from the TV show "Cheers."

The people inside all know each other's names and are regulars at the bar. And, just like the cast, the opinions of the people at Main St. Lounge are as different as the people themselves.

"I'm voting Democrat," Calvin Adcock, an Ardmore resident for 52 years, said. "I'm going solid Democrat. I don't like Republicans."

Adcock, a Vietnam War veteran, said when he was fighting in the war, it was the Republicans who made him return.

"We were winning the war, and they said we had to come home," he said. "It was the first time in the U.S. we lost a war."

Adcock said his friends who were also Vietnam War veterans planned to vote the same as he does in the 2000 presidential election.

"We like Bill and his wife," he said, "but we need some new meat, and we want someone who's been there."

David Bowell said Democrat or Republican, he didn't think too much of the election.

"They promise you everything," Bowell said. "They promise you everything and leave you standing."

Though he said he felt both sides were full of empty promises, he said he was going to vote for Vice President Al Gore because of his work with President Clinton.

"He did things that he got caught about, and got run through the coals about it, but they've all done it. They just didn't get caught," he said. "Gore's got the experience."

Whether Gov. George W. Bush or Gore win the election, Bowell said it wouldn't have much of an effect on him or his town. He said he's lived there his entire life and didn't think the election would change the town, which is about the same size as Manhattan, at all.

Just as some were adamant about voting for Gore, others chimed in with support for Bush.

"It's over with," Ardmore resident Clint Johnson said, remarking on the race for the presidential seat. "George Bush won it."

He said whoever did take the seat would definitely affect the citizens of the small Oklahoman town.

"The tax cut will affect the entire nation," he said. "This city more than most. There's a lot of government checks around here. For some reason, this town is a little more depressed than other towns, and I don't know why."

Oklahoma, a state favoring Bush in the polls, will remain decided, Johnson said.

"Oklahoma's leaning Republican all the time," he said. "I don't think you're going to see a lot of change here."

Johnson said he had lived in the town for about a year and a half and had learned a few things about the people.

"I don't hear a lot of politics talked about here," he said. "There's probably more tribal politics than national politics discussed about here."

Working out of Dodge City, Kan., as a truck driver, Johnson said that was one of the main differences between Kansas and Oklahoma. When asked about Green Party candidate Ralph Nader, he said Nader was discussed even less than Gore and Bush.

"You've got such a conservative Republican community, they probably can't tell you about the Reform Party, let alone the Green Party," he said.

Asked if Bush's recent DUI uncovering would affect his campaign, Johnson said no.

"After what the Democrats put in the White House, I don't think they can throw stones in a glass house," he said.

$170 billion over the next 10 years to aid public schools.

"Education is what we need to make America great," Buckley said. "It is what helps to keep America strong."

Education is an important issue to University of Kansas freshman Jessica Yarmo, but the main reason she supports Gore is his views on women's rights.

"He supports the woman's right to chose, and would appoint justices to support those views," Yarmo said.

While Yarmo talked, on the right side of the street Republicans stood wearing badges, signs and anything else to encourage Kansas City voters to throw their support toward Bush.

Susan Meyer said she was supportive of Bush's plan to cut taxes.

"I think the Republican Party in general wants people to be responsible," Meyer said. "I think Gore would almost bankrupt the government with all of his spending proposals."

Travis Reynolds of Kansas City, Mo., said he didn't like Gore's comments about the Internet, but he wasn't sure about Bush, either.

"I think either candidate would do a good job," he said. "I am just probably not going to vote for either one of them."

wider audience.

"They put out a great message, but the message needs to be out to the people who were not here," she said, "the undecided voters."

Organizers said the rally was designed to reinforce the beliefs of those volunteering and to encourage others to get involved. Throughout the rally, speakers called on the volunteers to continue campaigning and encouraged the citizens to vote for Gore.

"I am here to ask you to vote for Al Gore, but I am also here to ask you to get out there and tell other people to vote for him," Louise-Dreyfus said.

One volunteer on the Gore campaign is University of Missouri at Kansas City freshman Meghan Reule, who has been volunteering for the past three days. Reule said she is enjoying the experience.

"It has taught me a lot about the world of politics," she said.

Reule said she got involved with the campaign because she believes in the vice president's message and it was a chance to get involved.

"There really weren't a lot of opportunities on campus or different reasons to get involved," she said. "So this is a chance to make a difference."

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Weather should not discourage casting ballots

It has been proven that bad weather can result in a lower voter turnout. Even if it rains, there is no reason not to vote in the presidential elections.

However, it is not just the presidential position that is important in today's elections. Remember the local elections, because sometimes they fall below the excitement of the national elections. Do not just fill in the circles on the ballot — it is your duty as a citizen to be informed about those who will have an effect on your life. Local races are often close and need to be decided by informed voters.

The "Kansas is a traditionally Republican state, so why bother voting?" excuse will not work today, either. Even if you are not Republican, you should still cast your vote. Democrats have won races such as the Riley County Commission.

This could also be a turning point in terms of bringing more light to candidates in the Reform and Green parties. If they obtain five percent of the state's votes, their funds will be doubled for campaigning in the future.

There is a lot riding on voter turnout today.

As the saying goes, if you don't vote, then you don't have any room to complain. So grab your umbrellas and remember that every vote counts, including yours.

A Timeless Debate

Bush deserves vote due to his honesty, sincerity, strong moral beliefs

CLINT MUDRICK

Election Day has arrived. The most important choice of our collegiate careers (with the possible exception of Natural vs. Busch Light) is now at hand. Sadly, it seems to be a prevailing view around campus that Election Day is as frivolous to students as a little black book is to engineers.

If I hear "wasted vote" one more time I am going to scream. Though the Kansas' presidential pick is about as hard to predict as the victor in another classic K-State/North Texas battle, there are a couple factors that students should not forget.

The entire ballot is not comprised of checkboxes marked "George W. Bush" and "Al Gore." City, state and other national positions also are voted on, and these positions are of equal immediate importance to us. If you disbelieve this, consider that it is the local government that sets local taxes and encourages ABC to stop by so frequently. Just a little food for thought.

Students should understand that the point in voting is not only to back an eventual winner. If this was the case, the minority never would replace the majority, the tides never would turn for parties, and our nation still would be in its political infancy. Though I disagree with most of Ralph Nader and Pat Buchanan's stances, I respect people who vote for these candidates despite the odds they face. The majority will listen to the minority if the latter is loud enough. The only "wasted" vote is one not cast.

That said, I have decided to break free from the pack and vote for Bush. There might not be a great deal of rebellion associated with voting for the favorite, but keep in mind that anybody can vote a certain way just to be different. The oddities in the voting market are those who vote based on beliefs and not what their professors, fathers or roommates say.

To start, perhaps we should clear the waters. We should be electing a person who is honest, sincere and firm in his beliefs. Verbal mistakes should not come into play. Journalists across the nation try to peg Bush as stupid because he has occasion to trip over words and be at certain times not fully articulate. Thus, his master's degree from Harvard and bachelor's degree from Yale must both be flukes.

When a person is placed in the public eye for long enough, that person is bound to have some regret. Al Gore, the man everyone assumes is a genius, has had several of his own. To list them here would be to perpetuate a trend of looking at misquotes instead of character, so I will refrain; however, a quick Internet search of "Al Gore" and "stupid quotes" would prove fruitful to those who think the man is impeccably articulate.

Honesty and sincerity should be the key ingredients of a president. Gore lacks both. The man has no integrity, nor does the truth seem to be of value. From such trivial lies as his claimed Internet creation to his hypocritical and deceitful 180 on the tobacco issue, Gore has proven that he is willing to sell his character—and, in the case of the Chinese fund-raiser mishap, his nation—for personal gain.

Bush relies on his record and platform, not illusions and deception. Bush is strongly grounded in his beliefs and does not alter them to better his lot in specific situations. Truth is important to Bush, and it should be important to the American people too. The man is fully capable to run a nation and has proven that. Gore has proven only that he can lie his way up to any position.

The main policy selling points of each candidate are relatively similar. Thus, though I realize this approach is strange, I will skirt the platforms and move to a conclusion.

George W. might not be the best man in the nation; that man served his two terms in the '80s. Bush is, however, the best candidate, and what America needs. He is an honest man with strong convictions who understands his limitations. Clinton did not make our economy good, nor will it go bad when he leaves. Our nation does not need an economic leader; it needs a moral leader. Clinton made a mockery of morality in America, and Gore would continue the trend. There was a time when people wanted more from their politicians than feel-good deceit. Hopefully, we can return to that time.

As Gore said a few years before defending Clinton in the president's case of Congressional perjury, "Any government official who ... lies to the United States Congress will be fired immediately." I can only hope so.

Blowing bubbles can help relieve stress from classes

ZAC COOK

The votes are in. The results have been tallied. And the winner is ... stress by a landslide.

It doesn't matter the race, there will be a winner. Inevitably, there will be a loser. And as with any battle, there will be stress out the kazoo.

Stress is especially prevalent right now on campus. Forget the elections. Students' grade point averages are dropping faster than leaves. The course load is beginning to swamp the students. By finals week, students will be swimming in stress.

Even the upperclassmen have fallen behind. You can see it in the way they walk. Slowly, with heads lowered, smoking more cigarettes than ever before.

Only a few weeks ago, the pace was slow, chins were up and everything was rosy. Then came Homecoming Week and the barrage of crucial midterms.

Now, the casualties have been assessed. Early damage estimates bring grimaces to even the most stoic faces.

But you will survive and beat the stress. If it does not consume you, it only can make you stronger.

Here's the short list of things some people think work to relieve stress but don't.

1) Go to the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex and work out. But only if you have been there regularly some time in the past. If you haven't, you will be subject to feeling even worse because all the people at the Rec are so cut. You'll feel bad because you are not cut. It's OK.

2) Go to the Manhattan Town Center and buy everything in sight. This will lead you to feel very good in the short term, and the extreme financial pain you will endure won't come until Christmas. At that time, hopefully you will have lots of emotional support from family to deal with the stress. At least I hope you do.

3) Join every pub crawl you see. Go with the Bakery Science crawl, then join the Performing Arts ballet crawl. Notice your diversity increases as your bank account decreases. Your cultural competency seems to be directly proportional to the amount of money you spend on shots. Buy another round and slip into oblivion. Cheers!

Now here's the thing I guarantee to work.

I declare every Friday the stress-relieving day. I get up a little later and make my 10:30 class.

Then, I grab some grub at the Union, preferably a footlong steak and cheese with double tomatoes and lots of other veggies.

At 2:30, the real fun begins. I attend Consumer Behavior in Calvin Hall. This is quite hilarious, as no one knows who I am. I'm not enrolled in the class, but I enjoy the discussions. Which is better, straight razors or electric razors? I vote for the non-motorized blades!

Fifty minutes later, I burst through the doors with my faithful stress-relieving compadres. Our mode of transportation? Todd's 1988 Ford Bronco II. This gray and silver machine is a two-tone piece of divinity. With its terribly worn out shocks, a slight tap of the brakes resembles hydraulics like no other. This allows us to complete a maneuver commonly known as "flippin' switches." The up-and-down motion of the bucking Bronco makes otherwise unhappy people smile as they walk down the sidewalk.

After flippin' a few switches, Todd subliminally motions that the time has come to use our secret weapon against stress. A mixed sound of cheers and screams echoes from the back as Ben, Susan and Michelle realize what is about to happen. They watch slowly as I move toward the glove compartment, slowly turn the handle, and reach inside.

To the sound of trumpets, our angelic 4 oz. bottle of Tootsie Toy bubbles emerges to bring happiness for the melancholy world. Todd slows the car to bubble-blowing speed. I extend my right hand out the window. We cover campus, blanketing the ground with bubbles and proclaiming in unison, "It's Friday, everybody! No time to study. It's time to blow some bubbles!"

So if it's a Friday and you are feeling down, take your stress and throw it out the window. Look for the Bubble Blowing Bronco (LPV883) and enjoy watching us flip some switches and blow some bubbles. Don't ever let the stress have a chance.

Activity center will continue K-State's pursuit of excellence

Editor,

Forget what you have read and forget what you have heard. The pending issue of the possible student activities center is not a matter of SGA putting its name on a big project. It is not a matter of Student Body President Jake Worcester and Student Body Vice President Dana Pracht making good on a campaign promise. It is not a matter of bringing together greeks and non-greeks. It is not a matter of simply increasing student fees. It is much more than all that. Bottom line, building the activities center is about continuing K-State's pursuit of excellence.

So, we have to talk about the money. Everyone is concerned about money. There isn't a college student out there who hasn't bounced a check or hasn't scraped to find quarters for laundry, but let us try to put this into perspective. For the small fee of a maximum of $6.50 you can buy a meal, at least. You can buy a six-pack of beer, or a movie ticket, or you can pay that one small price each semester to a cause greater than yourself. You can give that money toward funding a building that will be a fixture of student life on campus for years to come. This is a three-tiered proposal. The administration and the KSU Foundation have realized the potential of this and have already pledged a large sum of money. The last branch is the students and voting yes on the referendum means looking beyond your personal interests and looking to the greater good of the student body.

So, what are the benefits? The actual structure of the building will be nothing short of impressive. Adding on to the east side of the K-State Student Union, we will see three levels of office space, secured storage space and work space for every student organization and student on campus to access and use. Resources such as copy machines, phones and computers will be available 24 hours a day, seven days a week for each and every one of us who is involved on campus. By bringing four main campus groups to one location and providing resources for all other organizations, programs will benefit from collaboration, and from the opportunities that come from simply knowing one another or from having the means in which to complete a project.

Let's face it, the greatest experience available to us at this university is not always in the classroom. The activities center will be a central place on campus that will foster a stronger commitment to improving the quality of the university as a whole. In general, it is a resource that K-State does not currently have in any form, but one whose benefits far out-weigh the costs.

Vote yes to make your university and its programs some of the top in the country. Vote yes to raise the bar and make K-State the best it can be.

Antibiotics policy raises questions from students

By ALYSON BALETZ
Kansas State Collegian

Sniffles, sneezes, aches and chills will send students running to Lafene Health Center this cold and flu season, but some students are concerned with Lafene's liberalness and rigidity with its antibiotics prescriptions.

Dr. Jay Reppert, medical director at Lafene, said there are borderline cases when the diagnosis of illnesses can be difficult.

"It can be hard to tell if an antibiotic is necessary or not," he said. "We don't ever want to send someone away that needed an antibiotic."

Reppert said that in past years, antibiotics were being prescribed frequently. He said resistant bacteria now are being formed.

In 1992, the bacteria that causes illnesses like ear infections showed a 5-percent resistance to Penicillin, he said. He said the same bacteria now are showing a 30 to 40 percent resistance.

"We used to have many students who felt they needed an antibiotic," he said. "Now, more students realize illnesses are viral and don't need antibiotics. It is a much different climate than a few years ago."

Catherine Barry, director of nursing at Lafene, said some students go on the Internet and try to diagnose themselves. They need to put more faith in their doctors, she said.

"It depends on the history of the individual," she said.

"Getting an antibiotic may be a common thing that has occurred. Some patients are satisfied if they don't get an antibiotic. Some come here with a different expectation."

Jaqueline Heinen, freshman in criminology, said she went to Lafene because she had a history of ear infections and felt like she was getting one. She said she asked for an antibiotic, but did not get one.

"I felt miserable and had a fever. I told the nurse my history," Heinen said. "I asked for an antibiotic because doctors have always prescribed me them in the past."

Heinen said the nurse told her that she was under a lot of stress and was not sick. Heinen said the conversation turned into a discussion concerning her mental well being, not her physical health.

"I wasn't necessarily mad at her, but I felt she wasn't really listening to my symptoms," she said.

Reppert said time helps to tell when to use an antibiotic. He said with common cold or flu illnesses, there should only be four days when the patient feels very ill. After the fifth day, he said, if the patient does not start to feel better, he will consider an antibiotic.

"Time and a progression of symptoms help us to know when to prescribe an antibiotic," he said.

Barry said sometimes students do not give enough feedback. She said the option usually is given to students to come back if they are not feeling better.

"If they don't feel better, they usually call their doctor from home or go to the emergency room to get an antibiotic, which is expensive," Barry said. "They should come back to Lafene so we can reevaluate."

Heinen said the nurse did encourage her to return in a week if she did not feel better.

"I didn't care about next week," she said. "I didn't feel good that day."

Resident hall assistant enjoys her job

By JESSICA PITTS
Kansas State Collegian

MATT STAMEY/Collegian

Renee Crist, junior in social work, watches over her friends as a resident assistant in Moore Hall. She makes sure no one on her floor breaks any hall rules while helping residents with day-to-day living.

Renee Crist, junior in social work, knew she wanted to be a resident assistant after her first year at K-State.

"I lived in Moore Hall my freshman year," Crist said. "I decided I wanted to apply to be a resident assistant basically because of the people I met. My RA was awesome and we are still good friends. She was one of the reasons I decided to apply."

However, Crist, RA for fifth floor in Moore Hall, moved out of the residence hall her sophomore year.

"I moved out my second year into an apartment with some friends," she said. "It was the best situation for the time, but I always knew that I was going to apply to be an RA the next year."

To apply for an RA position, Crist submitted her application and then went through an interview process.

"It was kind of nerve-racking at first," she said. "They narrow down a group to go through the interview process from the applications, so I was kind of relieved when I was picked for the interview."

Crist said she never regrets her decision to apply for the position even though it came with a lot of responsibility.

"I am basically here for the residents on my floor," she said. "I am responsible for upholding policies and for providing help and educational resources to the residents. However, I quickly learned my job goes way beyond the basics. Since most of the students on my floor are freshmen, I help them with any personal problems they have with the transition from high school and living with their parents to college and living in the dorms."

Crist said she also is required to have two social programs per year.

"I planned a pizza party at the beginning of the semester to get people more acquainted and we are having a slumber party this month," she said.

"We also try to have movie nights and game nights every once in awhile. However, I am noticing that they don't need me as much now because they are really starting to socialize and plan stuff on their own."

Crist, whose floor consist of both male and female residents, said she enjoys the experience of living on a co-ed floor.

"It is fun to get to know both the guys and the girls," she said. "There is not a lot of difference between the two. The girls tend to be a little more social and more adapt to do things in the hall, but the guys are really coming around. They all mesh well together."

The residents also have high opinions of Crist.

Adrienne Berry, resident of Moore hall, said Crist has become one of her good friends.

"She is an all-around great person," Berry, freshman in biological engineering, said.

"She was the first person who helped me when I first entered college, and now that I have gotten used to things around here, she is still the one that helps me. Renee is the first one I turn to, and because of that, she has really became a good friend."

Crist said she tries to leave her door open whenever she is in her room.

"I want to make it so the residents feel comfortable coming to me," she said. "I have what I call an 'open door policy,' which means as long as my door is open, I am available to talk. Sometimes I will find a bunch of people in my room just chatting, which is something that I don't mind."

Scott Peavler, resident of Moore hall, said the "open-door policy" is what makes Crist a good RA.

"Her door is usually always open, so I feel like I can go to her at any time with a question or a problem," Peavler, freshman in architecture, said. "She is really friendly and always willing to help."

Crist said her willingness to help sometimes keeps her really busy.

"It is pretty crazy, even hairy sometimes," Crist said. "I have found that I really have to learn to manage my time. For example, if I hold off studying for a test until the night before, there is a possibility that something may happen with one of the residents that I would have to deal with that night. That really leaves me in a bind, because my responsibility is to the residents, but school is sometimes really demanding. I am learning that planning ahead really benefits everyone."

Crist also has a part-time job in addition to being a RA.

"That just adds more craziness," she said. "However, as an RA, I am limited to working 10 hours a week, and the job has to be approved before I can take it. They also usually like it to be related to your major. I provide hospice care for a boy with cerebral palsy. I only work a total of six hours a week, so it doesn't take up too much time."

Crist said that even though being an RA takes up a lot of time and comes with a lot of responsibility, it is something she really enjoys.

"It is really fun, because there is always something going on," she said.

"All of my residents are really outgoing and we have a great community. I will definitely apply again next year because I really enjoy this."

Global Sports squad deals Wildcats 78-73 defeat to kick off preseason

By DEREK BOSS

It was just an exhibition game, but that doesn't mean head coach Jim Wooldridge wasn't disturbed.

"You know, you really shouldn't be upset in an exhibition game, should you?" he said. "I just felt like there were some things we should've handled better out there that we didn't. What those things are, I mean, we could talk about it all day."

In K-State's 78-73 overtime loss Monday night to Global Sports at Bramlage Coliseum, certain aspects of the game drew obvious concerns for the Cats' first-year coach — particularly on the defensive end of the floor, one of the areas of emphasis at Wildcat Media Day.

Quentin Buchanan grabs a rebound during Monday's game against the Global Sports All-Stars. The Cats lost the game 78-73 in overtime.

"It's an important aspect of our team and our season and our program," Wooldridge said Oct. 31 about the stress put on defense this year.

Yet, K-State didn't meet its defensive expectations Monday night.

"I thought our defensive rebounding was just atrocious, and our commitment to go after the ball was not adequate," Wooldridge said.

Global Sports' guard Michael Nurse, a former Iowa State Cyclone, lit the Cats up for 24 points on 8-for-12 shooting from three-point range.

"Michael Nurse was separated all night," Wooldridge said, "and we really never had anybody step up there and go get him."

Nurse got his team going late in the first half. With K-State leading 31-23 with just under five minutes to play before the intermission, Global Sports went on a 13-7 run to end the half, cutting the margin to 38-36 at the break.

The score see-sawed through much of the second stanza, until Global Sports grabbed a seven-point lead at 61-54 with six minutes to play.

However, the Cats clawed back to take the lead two minutes later on community-college transfer Matt Siebrandt's score in the paint, leading K-State on a 7-2 run and a 68-63 lead.

But Global Sports' scored the final five points in regulation to send the contest into overtime, and followed by outscoring the Cats 10-5 in the extra period to claim victory.

Yet, Siebrandt was still optimistic after the team's performance.

"It was the first game, you can't really ask much. You just come out and try to work out the jitters and the kinks and just improve," he said. "And I think as a team we came along a little bit in some areas and we struggled in some areas."

Nevertheless, senior Kelvin Howell said a loss is a loss, no matter if it's an exhibition game or not.

"It really doesn't matter what kind of game it is, but a win would do good on any team even if it's against a Division II team," he said. "So that could've been a confidence builder on our next game."

Even without the victory, though, Wooldridge said the game was not all for loss.

"There was enough positive flashes out there for us to go on to the next day," he said. "We'll get to the next day. I don't think the sky's going to fall in on us."

Injury report

Senior guard Galen Morrison went down with an ankle injury with 5:46 to play in the first half.

"I know Galen rolled his ankle pretty good," Wooldridge said. "I don't know how long he'll be out, but he said it puffed up on him pretty good, so he might be out a while."

Community-college transfer Richie Terry also exited with an unspecified injury in the second half.

"I don't know what happened to Richie. I asked him if he got hit and he said no," Wooldridge said. "And at that point, I had to move on to other things, so I haven't been able to find out yet."

Wooldridge questions Cats' shot selection

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

Scoring points coincides with effective offense for most basketball teams.

Not so with K-State.

The Cats were 11-of-19 from the field during the first nine minutes of the first half of the men's game Monday night and jumped out to a 24-14 lead.

Those numbers would seem to indicate that K-State ran its offense fairly well, but the opposite is actually true, head coach Jim Wooldridge said.

"I was a little disappointed in the shots we were taking early in the game. We made a run at their team and got out to a nine- or 10-point lead, and it was primarily through jump shots — they were missing theirs, and we were making ours," he said. "I don't think either team was doing a very good job of playing an inside-outside game — just a lot of jump shots.

"We can't match jump shots with people. We're going to have to do other things."

K-State did start using other things, and a change was apparent. ."

Saturday's game against Nebraska anything but cakewalk for K-State

FRANK FLATON

Don't start going nuts. Don't get crazy. And definitely don't book your Big 12 Championship tickets in Kansas City, Mo., yet.

K-State's match up against Nebraska will not be a cakewalk. It very well could be a blowout in favor of Nebraska. Hey, I'm not trying to be the bad guy. I'm just weighing the facts.

It would be a great turnaround and an amazing statement to the national media for the Wildcats to upend the Huskers. But be careful. The Wildcats aren't playing the Cyclones this weekend.

One game ago, K-State fans were disenchanted about the Wildcats and thinking of ways to sneak into Oklahoma games. That was then, though.

Now, the Wildcats look redeemed and ready for the Huskers and a possible Big 12 Championship berth. The running game against Iowa State looked better than it did all season. And the defense was just short of spectacular.

K-State seems to have put the worst behind it and put its season back on track. And with this newfound hope, fans are almost jumping the gun, calling for a big victory at home over the Huskers.

Be optimistic. Root for your team, but don't jump out of the realm of reality.

The Wildcats won't be able to beat the Huskers on talent and speed alone, like they could against Iowa State.

K-State will have to have every part of the engine running full throttle. Beasley must be near perfect. Scobey and the offensive line have to make the running game look like a page out of the Husker history book. The defense has to make Eric Crouch look as tough as a nun at a Marilyn Manson concert.

No dropped passes. No missed tackles. And no excess of penalties. The Wildcats can't escape with mediocrity. They have to play their best performance of the season. No doubts about it.

Nebraska is one of the best teams in the country. The Huskers can run the ball better than anyone, and Crouch can make any defense look like the Ford Hall flag football team.

Though its defense has shown signs of mortality, you can bet your "Children of the Corn" or "Huck the Fuskers" T-shirt that Nebraska will be ready to play.

In John Mabry's Lincoln Journal Star column, Nebraska's star linebacker Carlos Polk said some of Nebraska's players are still bitter about K-State's 40-30 win at K-State.

"Those were the worst fans I've seen in awhile," Polk said. "Every team loses sometimes, but when you throw it in a person's face like that, I think that was a slap in the face."

What did the Huskers do to respond to their red-carpet treatment in 1998? They annihilated the Cats, 41-15 in Lincoln last season. The Huskers aren't stupid. They have a habit of coming to play against good teams. And they know the Wildcats are the new kids on the block in the Big 12.

"We know we're going to go into a hostile environment, but we know that we're going to have to go in there with composure," Polk said. "We just can't go out there and play off strictly emotion. We've got to play with our heads."

Ditto for the Wildcats. K-State has all the tools and talent to be at the upper echelon of college football this season. That's not in question here.

Unfortunately, the Cats' character has been questioned.

K-State looked frazzled against Oklahoma, Texas A&M and even Texas Tech. They haven't been particularly prone to winning the big games, either. Hence the 1-19 record against opponents in the top 10.

All that has to change Saturday. The Wildcats have a clean slate. They have the opportunity to right the wrongs.

But it won't be easy. The Wildcats have to forget their three-game slide and play composedly against the Huskers.

If not, it might not be very pretty.

Recently formed XFL drafts 4 former Cat football stars

A quartet of former K-State football players were taken in the Player Allocation Selection System of the newly formed XFL, an eight-team professional football league owned by the World Wrestling Federation and NBC.

Wildcats drafted by the fledgling league include free safety Mario Smith (#265, Chicago Enforcers), wide-outs Darnell McDonald (#305, Los Angeles Xtreme) and Andre Coleman (#327, New York/New Jersey Hitmen), and running back Eric Hickson (#338, Birmingham Bolts).

The other four cities housing XFL teams are San Francisco, Las Vegas, Orlando and Memphis. The league will play a 10-game regular season schedule beginning in February 2001, with games broadcast by NBC and UPN.

The four former K-State selections are among a group of 54 one-time Big 12 Conference athletes taken by the XFL. Every team in the conference had at least one former player picked, with Oklahoma (11), Colorado (8) and Nebraska (8) heading the list of most players drafted from their respective Big 12 school.

Meanwhile, all four former Wildcats' names can be found among K-State's statistical leaders.

Smith (1993-96) is 24th on the school's career tackles chart (246) as well as the Cats' all-time leader with 23 career tackles in bowl games.

McDonald (1997-98) has K-State single-season records for receptions (75, 1998) and receiving yardage (1,092, 1998), while sitting sixth on the career receiving yardage chart (1,533) and seventh in career receptions (96).

Coleman (1990-93) tops the Cat record books in all-purpose yardage (3,443) and averaged a K-State-best 18.2 yards per touch during his career.

Hickson (1994-98) is the Wildcats' all-time leader in rushing yards (2,537) and touchdowns (26).

McDonald and Coleman also have NFL experience. McDonald was a reserve for the Tampa Bay Buccaneers last season, and Coleman played with both the San Diego Chargers (1994-97) and the Pittsburgh Steelers (1997-98).

3 Wildcat athletes honored for work within community

Three K-State athletes were honored by the Big 12 Conference and Bank of America by being selected as Bank of America Community Champions.

Women's basketball guard Kim Woodlee, along with football players Jon McGraw and Anthony Bates, were chosen for contributions both on and off the sports scene. Such contributions include athletic background and accomplishments, academic merits, involvement in community organizations and involvement with the school and community in other areas as well.

Bates, who was killed in a July automobile accident, was honored posthumously by K-State head football coach Bill Snyder.

Women's hoops star named preseason's top freshman

Laurie Koehn was named the 2000 Preseason Big 12 Freshman of the Year by the Big 12 media, conference offices released Monday.

Koehn picked up the same accolade last month when the league's coaches honored her, making the 5-foot-8-inch guard the first Wildcat to be named a preseason Big 12 Freshman of the Year by both the conference coaches and media.

As a team, K-State was predicted to finish ninth in the league by the conference media.

Women's basketball squad to start exhibition schedule

Head coach Deb Patterson's squad faces off against the Basketball Travelers at 7 tonight in Bramlage Coliseum.

The game will be the Cats' first action of the season.The team will begin its quest to break its season mark for attendance of 113, 608 set last season.

Basketball tickets available at Bramlage Coliseum now

Sports Information Director Doug Dull said Monday that students are reminded to pick up their season basketball tickets as soon as possible for the upcoming season.

Students may pick up tickets by showing their student ID at the Bramlage Coliseum ticket office during normal business hours, 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. Monday through Friday.

For more information, contact the ticket office at (785) 532-7606.

AROUND CAMPUS

WHO: Mark Edwards, director of Derby Dining Center, instructor in hotel and restaurant management

EDWARDS

Mark Edwards is concerned with food.

As the director of Derby Dining Center, Edwards is in charge of the largest dining center on campus. He also teaches a food production management class.

Edwards, who has worked at K-State since 1986, said he enjoys working with the students and faculty on campus.

"I don't think the caring attitude you hear about is hype," he said. "It's genuine."

When he's not working at Derby, Edwards spends his time working at his recently purchased horse stables with his wife, Donna, grooming horses, giving riding lessons and going on trail rides.

"We've been interested in horses since we were kids," he said. "But last year we had the opportunity to buy the stables so we went ahead and took the plunge."

A GAME OF WITS

Chess gives students chance to relax while keeping mind focused

By JJ DUNCAN
Kansas State Collegian

Two players at a board with 32 pieces and 64 squares sets the stage for infinite possibilities.

Chess, possibly one of the most intellectually engaging games ever created, has so many variations and strategies that the masters of the game study it their entire lives and never learn everything.

The members of the K-State/Manhattan Chess Club, who meet weekly, show it isn't just the professionals who are working at mastering the game. Michael Rohrer, chess club president, said one of the goals of the club is to work at improving the players' games.

"You will improve when playing against better players," he said. "Learning how to use the pieces themselves and using them together and not make blunders is important. When players come to the club, they are able to practice their game against players of various skill levels, which can really help."

The club was started five years ago by Ron Madl, director of the Wheat Research Center, and Raymond Paul, senior in chemical science, to give Manhattan chess players a place to meet and practice, Rohrer said.

Now, the club has around 20 members, and new players always are welcome. The first three visits to the meetings are free, and after that there is a fee of $5 per semester.

"Sometimes you go to tournaments and there are these difficult, challenging games that last forever. If you lose that match you may feel bad, but if you win, if you see the right move at the right time and you win because of it, that is a high that you will be riding on for a long time."

Mory Mort, member of the K-State/ Manhattan Chess Club

Membership in the club benefits players through giving them an environment conducive to learning the game, Rohrer said. One way the club helps members understand chess dynamics is through team games.

"Everyone gets in two teams, and a game is played where everyone on the team decides what the best move is," he said. "They are a lot of fun, and they're good for lower level players to help them understand why certain moves are good or bad, but they typically last a couple hours."

Mory Mort, 50, is one of the older members of the club, and said he still learns from the club's meetings. Mort, who is a registered member of the U. S. Chess Federation, said the chess tournaments are very competitive, and there is a ratings system for the players that determines which players will play as well as rankings. There is a mathematical formula for determining a player's rating, which goes up or down every time he or she plays.

Cash prizes are awarded to tournament winners, but Mort said players who consistently receive those prizes are rare, and the real reward for playing chess is the education it gives the player. He said it also can be a welcome break from everyday stress.

"It gives students a chance to take a break from things," he said. "Playing chess engages the mind as much as any studying, but it makes them think differently so it can be a nice diversion."

He said chess forces players to think strategically, and the decision-making skills it teaches can be applied to everyday life.

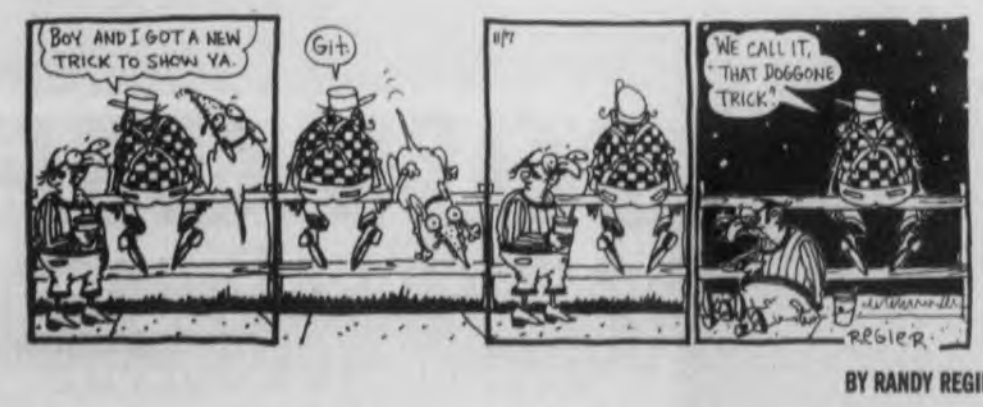
"Every time you get up out of bed you have to make little decisions throughout the day," he said. "Chess improves your thinking ability because it makes you learn how to make the best decisions."

Tom Brownscombe, scholastic director of the USCF, said that if a student is lacking in self-discipline and concentration, chess can develop those traits because the player sees the consequences of a lack of concentration right away. It also can be beneficial for players to be involved in a chess club because it gives them the chance to enhance their skills through work.

"When involved in any sport or other competitive activity, you have to have a place to practice or your chances of becoming a strong player are greatly diminished," he said. "It's just like if you played basketball and didn't have a place to practice. You would fall behind everyone else."

Brownscombe said a more recent development in chess that has made a big difference to players, is the introduction of chess to the online arena. Online chess has become so advanced that the National Collegiate Chess League will be host to a large online tournament this year.

Online chess is an easily available way to practice for many players, but Rohrer said even though he plays online, he still prefers sitting across from his opponent at the actual chess board.



"It's a lot easier to visit with friends while playing chess and have that friendship there," he said. "Online, you play against people who you never meet or get to know."

The rush of competition is one of the reasons Mort said he enjoys the game so much. Sometimes there are games that last as long as six hours that can be mentally exhausting, and it is difficult to stay sharp, he said. But even if a player loses, that loss should drive him to play more and work on weaker areas.

"Sometimes, you go to tournaments and there are these difficult, challenging games that last forever," he said. "If you lose that match you may feel bad, but if you win, if you see the right move at the right time and you win because of it, that is a high that you will be riding on for a long time."

Volleyball team comes back, grabs 1st road win in 3 tries

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

K-State's volleyball team showed more patience at Texas last Saturday than they had in previous road matches — and it paid off.

The Cats won an away match for the first time in their last three tries largely because they didn't get flustered when the momentum began to slip away, setter Disney Bronnenberg said.

"When we got down in rallies or when Texas had the momentum, we settled into our game plan for a change," she said.

"We stuck with it, we kept on their tendencies and we were really patient. We made some things happen that way."

K-State rebounded after falling behind 0-2 to win in five games. The Cats dropped the first two games 11-15 and 12-15, but won the next three 15-11, 15-8 and 15-10, respectively.

To make such a comeback required not only patience but also intensity, and carrying that emotional load was senior middle blocker Kelle Branting and junior outside hitter Lisa Mimick, head coach Jim McLaughlin said.

"More than anything, I liked the way we competed. I looked at the expressions on our faces and we were involved in the match the whole time," he said. "We were alert, we were aware, we were sharing emotion, and I think Kelle and Lisa did a good job of getting the fire going and carrying the emotional load."

Bronnenberg said she agreed that Mimick especially helped push the team emotionally.

"I remember coming out on the court after a time out and Lisa Mimick was just ready to kill a ball, and that helped fuel us," Bronnenberg said. "Lisa Mimick especially did a great job of coming out of her own game and making sure that the whole team was emotionally intense throughout the match, especially in game three on."

Mimick did not just pump up the team emotionally, however.

She also helped the team defensively at a time when they were struggling, Branting said.

"For a while there, we were struggling digging balls and passing, and she really got us into it," she said. "There was one sequence where she must have dug like five or six balls in one rally, just keeping us going, and we won the point.

"Things like that, little things that you can't see on the stat sheet, she really brings to the team."

Mimick and Branting weren't the only players to step up during the match, though.

Several freshmen played key roles in capturing the win, Bronnenberg said.

"Kris Jensen came off the bench, and in the middle of a rally, she dug a really hard hit and it just helped the momentum of the game. We were all so amazed," she said.

Lauren Goehring also added 17 kills and a 53.8 hitting percentage to help K-State defeat the Longhorns.

As a result of those young players' tough performances in the crunch, they now are freshmen in name only, Branting said.

"When I get out there on the court, I don't see 'freshman' tattooed on their forehead or anything like that," she said, "and I don't think they deserve it anymore. I think they've played well enough to this point where they deserve to be treated like anyone else. They've earned it."

Rowing team comes up short in Sunflower Showdown race

By DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

K-State was denied the Sunflower Showdown cup for the second straight year Saturday when the Cats lost to the University of Kansas, 15-11 in Lawrence.

Wildcat crew members raced to eight+ race victories in both novice and varsity divisions, but it wasn't enough to grab the cup back from the Jayhawks, who took both four+ races and three of five eight+ races at Clinton Lake.

KU's tight victory over K-State was the latest in a four-year series of close regattas fueled by the schools' intrastate rivalry.

Before this year's race, the Cats had a slim two-point lead in all-time points, but the Jayhawks took over that lead with their four-point win this weekend, tying the all-time series at two apiece.

After the Cats' emotional loss, sophomore Renata Rumold said Head Coach Jenny Hale was very supportive of the team.

"She said that we did a really good job and we need to work hard in order to compete in the spring," Rumold, sophomore in engineering, said.

UP NEXT
After completing the fall portion of their schedule this weekend in Lawrence, the Cats now will head indoors to train for the team's next regatta, March 11 at Tuttle Creek Reservoir.

Although the team did not win the overall regatta, the novice eight+ crew won the second novice eight+ race by almost 10 seconds over KU, their first second novice eight+ race win since 1998 in the series.

Rumold said the team's skill at the beginning of the race is what allowed the Cats to put up an impressive 7:37.1 time on the 2,000-meter course.

"I thought we had a great start," Rumold said. "That was a big factor. We stayed together and that's what won it for us. It was an awesome race."

K-State's varsity win came in the most important race of the day, the first varsity eight+. The Wildcats sprinted to the best time of the day, a 6:41.6, more than four seconds quicker than the Jayhawk boat that finished in 6:45.7.

Mo McGrath was the coxswain of the Cat boat, and said focus played a major role in the way the team performed.

"I think that we were all just really focused on working together during the race," McGrath said, and that focus translated into a wide lead in the latter stages of the race.

K-State's win in the first varsity eight+ competition was the first against KU in the Sunflower Showdown since 1997, a trend that has hurt the Cats historically because that race has the most point value in the regatta.

McGrath, junior in marketing and international business, said it's exciting to see a change in the success of the varsity eight in this regatta.

"I think, for us, it's really exciting to know we'll hold this boat for a while," McGrath said.

After seeing their first sprints competition of the year in the Jayhawks, McGrath expects her team to continue their fall success in the spring, but said other teams will continue to improve as well.

"First of all, we're expecting them to get faster," McGrath said of KU, who the Cats will see again in a dual regatta in spring 2001. "That means that we'll have to get faster as well."

K-State's spring schedule will offer more of this type of competition, as the team's "head" races will cease until next year in favor of the shorter, faster sprint races that are in the spring.

BASKETBALL

Over the remaining 11 minutes of the half, K-State only shot 4-for-15 from the field and watched their lead dwindle to 38-36.

However unlikely, the change was good, Wooldridge said.

"Richie Terry got to the basket a few times during that 4-of-11 stretch and missed some shots around the basket, but we were getting some shots around there at that point," he said. "We just didn't finish them."

So, the shots are there when the offense is working, the players just need to finish them.

The offense will be fine, point guard Larry Reid said.

"I think people were a little shaky about what they were supposed to do the first time out," he said. "I think it's going to come along as soon as everybody figures out what to do."

And if everyone learns their spots, the offense can be very effective, Reid said.

"It gets a lot of people open shots, it creates. It spreads the floor. It's a good offense," he said. "It's a cut offense. If you cut, you pretty much can't go wrong."

Often, however, the Cats didn't cut or push the ball up the court, and the offense stagnated as a result, Wooldridge said.

"We never got into a quick offense. We were really slow materializing into the front court. It looked like our energy was spent, and we couldn't force this team to pay a price for perhaps not getting back down the floor," he said. "We never really challenged them in that respect, and that's disappointing because you've got to get some easy opportunities in a game."

It's still early, though, to make judgments on the Cats' play, especially the community college transfers, Wooldridge said.

"I think we have to, as coaches, maybe temper our evaluation right now," he said, "and let's go to the next practice and the next exhibition game."

Cold remedy drug investigated as stroke cause

By LAURAN NEERGAARD
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Food and Drug Administration warned Americans on Monday not to use dozens of over-the-counter cold remedies or appetite suppressants until their makers replace an ingredient that could cause hemorrhagic strokes, especially in young women.

The ingredient, called phenylpropanolamine or PPA, is found in products ranging from Dexatrim to Triaminic.

The FDA said it is taking steps to formally ban PPA, but meeting the legal requirements will take a few months. So meanwhile, the agency wrote manufacturers asking them voluntarily to immediately quit selling products containing the ingredient.

At least one manufacturer told retailers Monday to remove a PPA-containing cold remedy, Contac 12-hour Cold Capsules, from store shelves. Five other versions of Contac contain an alternative ingredient, pseudoephedrine, that is safe, stressed manufacturer SmithKline Beecham Consumer Healthcare. It urged consumers to call a hot line — 1-800-245-1040 — if they're confused about the risk.

The risk of a hemorrhagic stroke, or bleeding in the brain, is very small to an individual user. But with millions of Americans swallowing PPA every day, the FDA determined the ingredient could be to blame for 200 to 500 strokes just in people under age 50 — those who typically are too young to be at risk for strokes.

"We suggest you stop taking the drug immediately and use an alternative," says an FDA warning issued for consumers Monday. Consumers should check the ingredient list of all nonprescription cold relievers for PPA and avoid those products, the FDA said. Instead, they could use cold pills containing the ingredient pseudoephedrine, or use nasal sprays.

However, PPA is the only nonprescription diet ingredient on the market. There are prescription weight-loss drugs, so dieters should consult their physicians about their options, said FDA nonprescription drugs chief Dr. Charles Ganley.

Drug manufacturers had fought the FDA's decisions, arguing that concern over the decades-old ingredient was overblown. But in a public hearing less than three weeks ago, FDA's scientific advisers dealt manufacturers a blow by voting unanimously that PPA is unsafe.

Drug companies were scrambling Monday to decide how to react to FDA's request. The maker of the largest-selling nonprescription diet pill, Dexatrim, Chattem Inc., refused comment.

Hemorrhagic strokes, while the least common type of stroke, often are deadly and can leave survivors disabled. They are very rare in people under age 50; the risk rises with age, as well as with high blood pressure, smoking, alcohol and use of blood-thinning medicines.

Doctors' first warning sign about PPA came in the 1980s when medical journals cited several dozen puzzling cases of young women who suddenly had strokes within days of taking appetite suppressants.

The FDA's own records show 44 cases of hemorrhagic stroke among PPA users in the past 30 years. Most were women; the median age was 35.

But the drug industry successfully argued more research was needed to prove if PPA was to blame. So the Consumer Healthcare Products Association funded a five-year study by Yale University comparing 702 hemorrhagic stroke survivors under 50 with 1,376 similar controls who never had suffered a stroke. The goal was to see if PPA use was more common among stroke sufferers than among healthy people.

The study found PPA increases stroke risk for young women — not men — under two circumstances: within three days of taking PPA-containing appetite suppressants, or within three days of taking their first-ever PPA dose for any reason.

Nobody knows why PPA would have that effect, although first-time PPA use sometimes temporarily raises blood pressure, an effect that wanes as the body gets used to the drug. Risk was highest with the higher doses — more than 75 milligrams daily — that dieters were more likely to use.

But the FDA ultimately concluded there was no way to predict who was most at risk from using PPA. While the ingredient does clear a stuffy nose, that's just not a big enough benefit to take the chance, the FDA ultimately decided.

"Not to be alarmist — it's clear this is a very rare event," Ganley said. "But even though it's rare, it's an irreversible event."

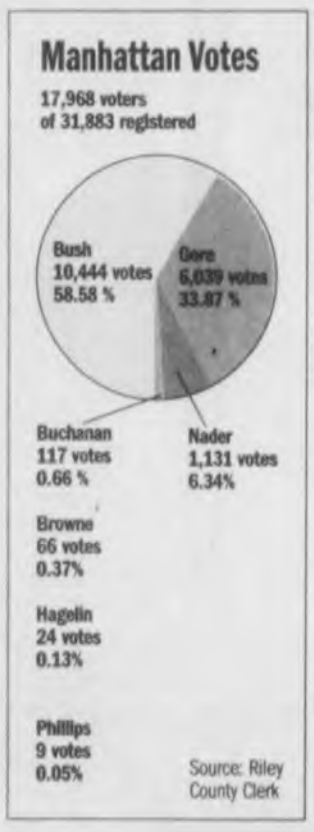
Still no president after early morning polls

By NANCY FOSTER
Kansas State Collegian

AUSTIN, Texas — Rusty Walker, a resident of Fort Worth, Texas, said he had one wish for the Democratic Party after the recount was announced.

"It's going to be a slow, painful death for them," he said. "We hope they get every bit of torture they are asking for."

He said this was still Gov. George W. Bush's election and that they would celebrate later today.



"It just makes our victory that much sweeter," he said.

After waiting all day to see Bush, he said they were a little disappointed, but that it was worth it.

"The excitement and the enthusiasm was fun," he said, "but we're tired and ready to go home and get some sleep."

At 3:50 a.m., supporters still surrounded the stage where Bush would have given his victory speech.

No concession from Gore following close results

NASHVILLE — Maybe every vote does count.

With 99 percent of the vote counted, George W. Bush held to a 2,940,198 to 2,893,318 lead over Vice President Al Gore in the state of Florida.

Response from the crowd gathered outside of Gore's Nashville headquarters quickly had their frowns turned upside down.

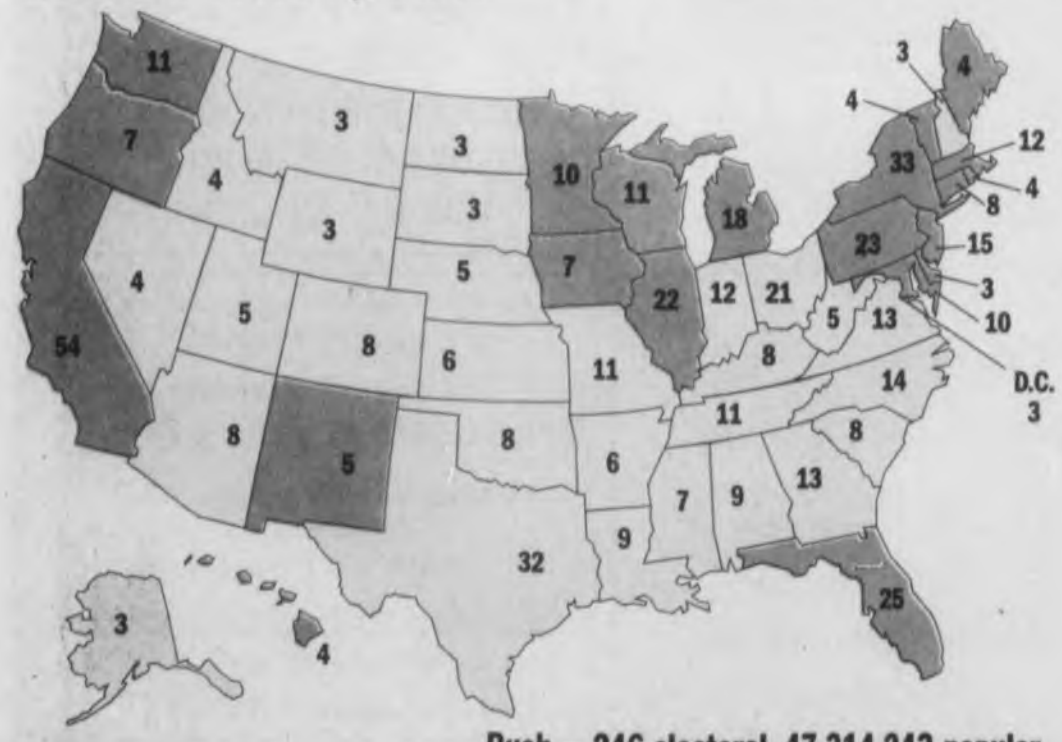
"It sure turned around, didn't it?" Gore supporter Jason Forrester said with a smile on his face.

Just an hour before Gore had given in to Bush, and Forrester was somber.

"It hurts, people volunteered hundreds and thousands of hours," he said. "To be so close to a victory and not get it is hard."

Now the closeness of the victory might not be out of faith. Other Gore supporters yelled for followers to keep the faith and Forrester said the campaign will live to fight another day.

New York City resident Roger Wolfsen said the turn of events favors Gore.



"I think the counties that they need a recount are in favor Gore and Lieberman," he said. "If you look at the counties, they favor a recount."

Dov Langenauer said he was disappointed in the medias ability to cast a winner.

"My main concern is that

Florida votes too close to name winner

By RON FOURNIER

Texas Gov. George W. Bush fought Al Gore in an agonizingly close presidential election Tuesday that came down to one state and a few thousand votes. Gore called Bush with congratulations, then called back to say he wasn't ready to concede.

"Unbelievable," sighed Bush adviser Karen Hughes, after fielding the second call from Gore.

It was an incredible political spectacle by any standard. "There's never been a night like this one," said Gore campaign chairman William Daley, after his boss retired for the night — unsure whether he had won or not.

"Until the results in Florida become

Students vote Thursday on new center

By BRYAN SCRIBNER
Kansas State Collegian

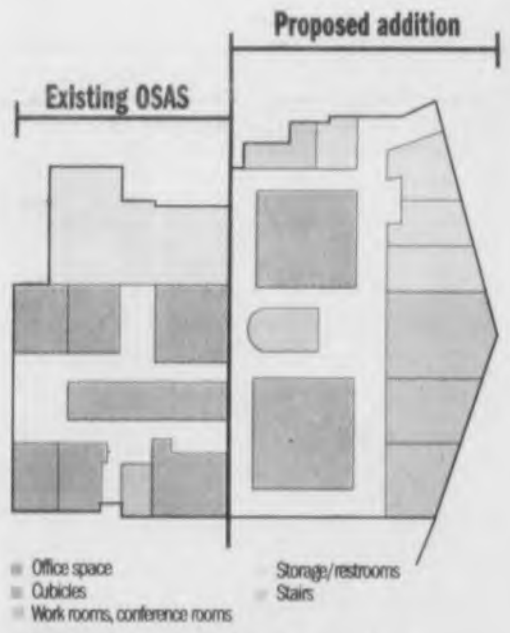
A student referendum vote Thursday will ask students if they agree to funding a Student Activities Center, which would raise student privilege fees $6.50 per semester for the next 15 years.

The most recent campus-wide referendum vote asked students if they would agree to a $6 to $12 privilege fee increase to help fund a stadium expansion. Students rejected the 1997 proposal, which made it the only referendum vote of four that has failed since 1976.

MORE INFO
Student referendum voting is from 7 a.m. to 7 p.m. Thursday in the K-State Student Union. For more information visit the Student Activities Center Web site at www.ksu.edu/sac.

Travis Lenkner, Student Senate Chair, said that unlike the stadium expansion, the activities center vote will directly benefit students.

"This time we have found alternative sources of funding, we've cut the cost and now it's down to the point where this is a $6.50 investment on a significant structure," he said.



Lenkner said the privilege fee increase is minimal in comparison with past fees established to fund projects such as the K-State Student Union renovation.

Privilege fees fund all student services. Students enrolled in at least 12 hours were charged $257 in fees this semester.

The $6.50 fee would contribute about $1.8 million to the $4.8 million project. Student Body President Jake Worcester said another $750,000 from the privilege fee reserves account would be utilized.

The reserves account is an accumulation of

The first and second floors would contain additional office and meeting space and cubicles. There is also a proposed atrium for natural light. The east side of the Union addition faces Mid Campus Drive across from Kedzie Hall.

Students vote Thursday on whether to create up to a $6.50 per semester privilege fee for the next 15 years to pay for the approximately $5 million 16,525-square-foot center.

Bank robber gets away with money

By JENN DAVOREN
Kansas State Collegian

An aggravated robbery surprised employees of the First Bank at 1800 Claflin Ave., Suite 100, Tuesday afternoon.

At approximately 4:30 p.m., a man entered the bank and robbed its three employees at gunpoint, said Lt. Kurt Moldrup of the Riley County Police Department.

After taking an unspecified amount of money, the suspect then ordered the three employees to lie on the floor as he left the building.

No one was injured in the robbery.

The suspect is described as a 6-foot, 160- to 180-pound white man between the ages of 40 and 55, with short silver hair and a silver mustache. He was wearing square silver-framed glasses, a navy blue ball cap with white lettering on the front and back, a gray sweatshirt, navy blue nylon pants with cargo-type pockets and white tennis shoes.

Bank employees were not able to describe how or where the suspect fled following the robbery, Moldrup said.

Anyone with information regarding the robbery can contact the RCPD at 537-2108.

18-year-old again with family after 15 years

VENETA, Ore. — An 18-year-old woman who vanished 15 years ago was reunited with her family after she wandered into a sheriff's office and asked for help.

Fallon Marie Hodges allegedly vanished with her baby sitter in 1985, but the disappearance was not reported at the time, the Medford Mail Tribune and KVAL-TV in Eugene reported Monday.

Police said Hodges had been living with a couple who left her in Lovelock, Nev., about 90 miles northeast of Reno, telling her they would contact her once they were safely away and tell her about her true identity.

Hodges waited for a month before contacting Nevada authorities, telling them she didn't know her real name — but she thought it might be Fallon.

Investigators checked birth records and found a Fallon Marie Hodges who was born in Eugene on Oct. 17, 1982. From there, they linked the girl to her mother, Eveleen Strempel of Veneta.

Police said Hodges had been living in Washington with the baby sitter, Marcella Whitehead, and a man named Roland Homenyk.

Persian County Sheriff Ron Skinner said it wasn't clear whether Hodges had been abducted or abandoned.

Hodges says she was led to believe she was abandoned and blames Whitehead and Homenyk.

"I believed them," she told KVAL. "I believed all the lies they told me, which was a lot, I'm finding out."

Strempel said she had left little Fallon and her twin brother, Dustin, with Whitehead while she sorted out her financial problems. She returned for Dustin, and said she would be back soon for Fallon. But the sitter and the girl were gone when she returned.

Strempel told KVAL she never reported her daughter missing because she was going through a difficult time, she didn't have a home and was involved in drugs. But she says she never stopped looking for her and claims she was misled by Whitehead.

Killer asteroid theories retracted by scientists

LOS ANGELES — Scientists who announced last week that a mysterious space object had a 1-in-500 chance of striking the Earth in 30 years have retracted their prediction, saying it poses little threat.

The object, which is either a small asteroid or piece of space junk, has virtually no chance of hitting the planet in 2030.

However, scientists at the Jet Propulsion Laboratory in Pasadena said there's a 1-in-1,000 chance it could hit Earth in 2071.

"This object is much more interesting than threatening," said Donald Yeomans, manager of NASA's Near-Earth Object Program.

Predictions of the path of the object now indicate it will pass no closer than 2.7 million miles to Earth — about 11 times the distance from the Earth to the moon.

The object, designated 2000 SG344, is either an asteroid about 200 feet in diameter or a 35-foot-long Apollo-era rocket booster. It was discovered Sept. 29 through a telescope in Hawaii.

Before the new data was revealed, Yeomans had said that if the object was an asteroid it could create a fairly sizable nuclear blast if it struck the Earth.

The retraction and downgrading was the second embarrassing asteroid announcement in recent years. Scientists at the Minor Planets Center in Cambridge, Mass., generated headlines worldwide in 1998 when they announced that a mile-wide asteroid had a chance of hitting Earth in 2028. The prediction was retracted a day later when further calculations were made by JPL.

Cause of fatal jet crash confirmed by officials

TAOYUAN, Taiwan — One week after the deadly crash of a Singapore Airlines jetliner, investigators confirmed for the first time Tuesday that a construction crane ripped open the belly of the jumbo jet as it hurtled down the wrong runway.

Eighty-two people died in the fiery takeoff attempt.

Last week, when crash experts disclosed the contents of the cockpit recorder of Flight SQ006, they only would confirm that the pilot picked the wrong runway and that there was a series of collisions as the plane sped down the airstrip.

Seconds after the jet began its takeoff, a front wheel hit a concrete barrier about 4,950 feet down the runway. Then the plane slammed into a crane that peeled open its underside, said David Lee, an investigator with Taiwan's Aviation Safety Council.

Kay Yong, managing director of the Aviation Safety Council, said the probe is focusing on whether the closed runway — which was parallel to the plane's assigned runway — was improperly lit, inviting the pilot to make the fatal choice Oct. 31 during a storm brought by an approaching typhoon.

Investigators have heard conflicting reports about whether the lights along the side of the closed runway were on, indicating to the pilot that he could use the strip, Yong said.

Yong said that seconds after the crash, an airport maintenance vehicle requested that the air traffic control tower turn on the runway lights. The request, however, did not specify which of the two runways had their lights switched off, he said.

Local Republicans dominate Riley County election results

MATT STAMEY/Collegian

Rep. Jeff Peterson, R-Manhattan, enters the Republican headquarters Tuesday night after defeating Democrat Dean Stramel for a seat in the Kansas House of Representatives. Peterson received 56 percent of the votes.

By NANCY HULL
Kansas State Collegian

Wide smiles filled the Riley County Republican Headquarters on Tuesday night. With the success of local Republican candidates, there was nothing to frown about.

Riley County Republicans running for state senators, state representatives, county commissioners and Board of Education all came out victorious.

State Representative incumbent Jeff Peterson won the 66th District Legislature seat after defeating Democrat Dean Stramel by a vote count of 3,415 to 2,617. Peterson said he's thankful the elections are over so he can relax and get to work.

"There's always the Election Day jitters," Peterson said. "I waited until all the results were in before I started to feel good about everything."

First and foremost, Peterson said he wanted to thank his supporters and campaign workers. He also said he wanted to recognize his opponent, Stramel.

"He put a lot of energy into his campaign, and it's important to recognize his efforts," Peterson said.

Staying disciplined and focused throughout the campaign are reasons Peterson said led to success.

"I've been committed to K-State and all higher education," he said. "I stayed focused on responsible growth policies to fund higher education and public schools."

Peterson said his priority now is to ensure funding of the higher education act for the second year in a row. He said he'll also focus on increasing faculty salaries for the six traditionally regent schools and help teaching retirees within the state.

"A lot of those retirees taught at K-State. I'm focusing on protecting KPERS and those who rely upon KPERS," he said.

Before the results were tallied, Manhattan resident Gorden Cramer said he was hopeful Peterson would win, but he had some doubts.

"His opponent was out knocking on doors. Peterson had the K-State students support the first time he ran, but I don't know how much that will carry over now," Cramer said.

Bob Newsome, Republican winner in the second district County Commission race, said he had been confident throughout his campaign. Newsome was victorious over Democrat Ruth Schrum 3,191 to 2,227.

"In my campaign I laid out my plan and continued to carry it out," Newsome said. "I haven't really worried. I 've been confident ever since I decided to run again this year."

Door-to-door campaigning played a large role in his success, Newsome said.

"I walked every street of every precinct. No other candidate does that," he said.

Riley County Republican Chairman Charles Hostetler said part of Newsome's success can be attributed to his effectiveness as a county commissioner.

"He has a strong background in county government in addition to experience on the school board and extension department at K-State," Hostetler said. "He's very well regarded in the community."

Locally, Hostetler said he was quite happy with how Republicans finished.

"I think Republicans had a number of strong candidates running. I feel good about Riley County tonight," he said.

Presidential election not only disappointment for local Democrats

By CRISTINA JANNEY
Kansas State Collegian

Although Manhattan Democrats' faces were full of hopeful anticipation as they watched presidential returns, the countenances were glum as they came back from the phone with local results.

No Manhattan Democratic candidates prevailed in their races.

Dean Stramel fought a close race against Republican incumbent Jeff Peterson for the Kansas House 66th district. Stramel lost with 2,617 votes compared to Peterson's 3,415 votes.

Ruth Schrum said she thought she fared well in a predominantly Republican district in her race for the Riley County Commission district three seat against Republican Bob Newsome. She received 2,227 votes compared to Bob Newsome's 3,191 votes.

Stramel said Peterson had the advantages of being an incumbent, a Republican in a predominantly Republican district and more campaign money.

"I was really pleased that at 10:30 at night that we still had them nervous," Stramel said.

He said he thought he was further hurt by an increase in Republicans coming out to vote for George W. Bush.

Stramel said he challenged Peterson to be more visible and accessible in the community.

He said he remained interested in state politics and might consider another run for office.

Schrum said she did not expect her race to be so close.

"It meant there was a lot of crossover vote for me," she said.

She said she would continue to be an activist in local politics but was not interested in running for political office again.

Attending three presidential inaugurations and three conventions, she and her husband have also been active at the national level. She said the presidential race was exhausting to watch.

"It is very upsetting," she said. "I want Gore to win. I don't understand what people are doing going for this unknown candidate."

Because Kansas has never voted Democratic in a presidential election, some potential Democratic voters are discouraged from going to the polls, Jason Matthews, president of Young Democrats, said.

Because all of the electoral votes go to the Republican candidate, some voters think their votes don't count, Matthews said.

That means the party loses votes on the local level as well, he said.

"Most local races are decided by 300 to 400 votes," he said.

"I think we can influence 300 to 400 people. I don't think it is a hopeless cause."

Amie Kershner, senior in political science and public relations, worked on Democrat Dennis Moore's campaign for the U.S. House District 3 seat and said she thought local issues and candidates were important.

However, she had special attention turned to the New York Senate race. She interned for a New York U.S. representative this summer.

Although the candidate she worked for did not win, she was pleased Hillary Clinton was victorious in her Senate race.

"I think she will do a great job," she said. "I didn't buy that carpet bagging thing."

Dave Kephart, junior in finance and pre-law, said he came to the Democratic headquarters in part to escape from his three Republican roommates.

He said he was concerned that young voters weren't more informed on the issues.

"I hope they looked at the names and thought about what the next four years will be like," he said.

KELLY GLASSCOCK/Collegian

Martha Gray, chairwoman of the Riley County Democratic Party, is informed that early predictions of Al Gore winning Florida was changed to too close to call.

Electoral votes should be split in each state

Recently there has been debate on whether the Electoral College is the correct national voting procedure.

Some people think the electoral voting system is outdated and the president should be elected only by popular votes. Others think the Electoral College is a plan that lets the educated be the voices of their given states.

However, something else can be done that will allow more candidates to campaign in places other than the large cities, or the states with the extremely high amount of electoral votes. Maine and Nebraska proven this system can work.

In all of the other states, the majority of the popular vote takes all of the electoral votes. In Nebraska it is similar, but there is a difference on the Congressional district level. When a candidate wins a district, he or she wins one electoral vote. Two electoral votes go to whoever wins the popular vote. This makes it possible to split up the possible electoral votes. Instead of Kansas automatically sending all of its six electoral votes, this idea could open up the possibility of dividing them. For example, four votes could be for one candidate, and two for his or her opponent.

By implementing this system there would be more campaigning to smaller areas and states that are not automatically assumed by one party as being "won."

We encourage the state to look at this option prior to the next election. It would make more candidates earn their votes.

TRUE CONFESSIONS from a TV consumer

"I watch TV — what do you want from me?"

my view
KEN WELLS

In a matter of hours, I will rejoin the throng of Americans blessed with the joy of cable television. And just in the nick of time.

The cable installation date's been set for some time now. Long enough time for election hoopla to fade from a bright, burning flame on the horizon to that lone lighter held up in the back row of a Phil Collins concert by some stoned maniac bellowing "Freebird!" at the top of his lungs. Long enough that I've had to amuse myself with fewer channels than the Chargers have wins (eh, let's make that "touchdowns"). Long enough that I will stab my eyes out if I have to sit through another fetid promo for CBS's "The Fugitive," evidence that network innovation died about the same time they let Rudy off the island.

I've lived through worse. Up through high school I had only two channels, CBS and, when the wind blew right, ABC. But I didn't know what I was missing. And this was back when "Automan" was on the air. Remember Automan and his sidekick, Cursor? Wasn't that brilliant ... ?

Well, no, it wasn't. Matter of fact, it might've been canceled in the middle of an episode — the whole network flipping to a test pattern for the remaining 14 minutes — and nobody would've cared. Or noticed, really. But back then I had the TV schedule memorized. Honestly. I could tell you what was on both channels, every night, every time (Fall was always a confusing time of year for me).

Now, for a handful of minutes more, I have to live with only those same two channels again. But now I'm burdened with the burning knowledge that "Nash Bridges" is not eloquent discourse (it might not, indeed, be either). I'm haunted by the awareness that some people, with full use of all limbs and at least one lobe of their brain, watch "Bette" without a court order forcing them to do so. And someone out there thinks that "Walker, Texas Ranger" is art. These moments don't make me want to cry, but they do make me want to make someone else cry (I usually stand menacingly behind Sarah Bahari until she notices and cringes and lets out a little yelp of "Ow." Eventually, I think she'd cry. I'll keep you posted).

Sixty-one channels soon will come pouring into my living room. Some of these are necessities. I'm a news junkie. I keep thinking, "Hrm, trouble in the Middle East. I should do something." Yeah, like I've got a rapid-deployment force (The squirrels don't count, and besides, they don't like powder-blue helmets). I must have hockey. Time was I'd say "I must have football," but after the unholy trinity of watching the Cats, Chiefs and Chargers all lose in most painful fashion to truly despicable foes from Oklahoma and Oakland, well, bring on the Colorado Avalanche and drop the puck, thank you very much.

Sad thing is, the average intelligence-per-channel level will not skyrocket. For all the good, there comes the bad. Here's my question — does anyone watch the USA Network anymore? "Let's air R-rated quasi-porn edited for television, interrupted by ads for phone sex and psychics."

Mission statement of the damned, right there. And while TNN now means "The National Network" (not a term which conveys any type of distinctive identity — great, guys — but still I think three consecutive episodes of "Dukes of Hazzard" gives it away, there, Clem), could we find a new name for MTV? How about "Find out which five videos we're playing in "saturation rotation this month"? Or "The Unusual Camera Angle Network"? Or "Commercials Interrupted by Almost-Related-to-Music Programming Network"?

The second string channels are hit-and-miss. ESPN 2: best case, ESPN leftovers; worst case, billiards. Stone me. Sci-Fi Channel: best case, "Mystery Science Theatre 3000;" worst case, "Carnosaur 2." UPN: best case, "The Simpsons;" worst case ... anything except "The Simpsons."

Herein lies the significant advantage of cable versus broadcast: specialization. No more one-channel-trying-to-do-everything nonsense. Sports, cartoons, movies, news, everything nicely partitioned. Joy. Which is a very junk-drawer approach — if I ever, ever want to watch golf, I'll know exactly which channel to turn to. But I won't. Ever. Never in my life. I don't hate myself that much.

And while I'm now reveling in the glee and joy of multiple channels, I may have stumbled onto the greatest television program of all time — that being WIBW-TV's "First News" morning show. Back when I worked in radio (if you could call it that), I often was conscious of the fact that nobody was paying any attention, so I did whatever the hell entered my tiny little mind.

I had fun, often to unhealthy extremes. And that's what former Manhattanite Scott Rhodes is doing, along with the ever-kinetic Rob Peppers — if you get tired of talking heads and want to see human beings having fun in the morning, give it a shot. Can't recommend it enough. But drink coffee before watching, or you'll just get confused and fall over a lot.

Or maybe that's my medication. Hard to tell.

They call television a cancer on our society. I have to amend that to say bad television will kill us all someday. One particularly insipid episode of "Parked on an Angel" will trigger divine retribution once they stumble onto an accidentally-heretical combination of plot elements, so I can't wait.

Until then, rejoice in the knowledge that if you want to use cable as an enabler, an excuse to stay sedentary and withdrawn and reclusive, fine but television's no more at fault than the floor you're standing on. I don't need that excuse; I do it on my own. Nyah. But it also can be a gateway to information, entertainment and genuine culture, if you know where and how to look. Oh, and hockey. Don't forget hockey.

And go out and vote, dammit.

READERS WRITE ABOUT THE STUDENT ACTIVITIES CENTER

Activities center to provide support for smaller groups

Editor,

This letter is in response to some of the comments recently made about the student activities center. The fact that the Arts & Sciences Council as well as Student Governing Association as a whole get thousands of dollars back from clubs that do not use their allocations is a primary reason students should vote for the student activity center. One of the greatest issues facing our campus organizations is a lack of support as evidenced by the returned allocations and the nearly 100 organizations that go out of existence each year. The student activity center would provide the necessary support and resources these organizations need to thrive. Professional advising, leadership development and secretarial support are just a few of the resources more students of K-State would have access to.

Students have been aware of this need for years. When students created the priority list for the enhancement of the K-State Student Union, a student activities center was a high priority. The money, however, was not there at that time or we would be enjoying the benefits of the SAC today. Last fall, another committee of students decided that the need for a student activities center was still present. Now, Thursday, our student body has a chance to help fill that need. At a fee of only $6.50, we can do so for a relatively small amount considering the amount students in the past have paid for things such as the Chester E. Peters Recreational Complex, Bramlage Coliseum and Hale Library.

I wish I would still be around K-State to see the benefits of the SAC. The opportunities for student involvement and collaboration between organizations is very exciting. I encourage K-Staters to vote yes on the student activities center on Thursday and help contribute to student life on campus.

IFC, Panhellenic Council support activities center

Editor,

We are writing this letter to clear up some confusion about the greek system's stance on the proposed student activity center. Apparently, there has been much misconception regarding Greek Affairs' attitude or opinion towards the proposed center.

Members of the Interfraternity and Panhellenic councils are unanimously in support of building the SAC. The center will serve as an incredible tool for K-State's student body and offer innumerable benefits to all student organizations, including Greek Affairs.

First, the center will act as a home to all student groups. This is especially vital to those groups that have no permanent location to store their belongings or a place in which to meet on a regular basis. Greek Affairs and other organizations that do reside in a building on campus will benefit from the SAC because so the opportunity to move to a more centralized location. In addition, the center would provide an atmosphere of cooperation, one more conducive to daily interaction between various student groups. Both the Interfraternity and Panhellenic councils are eager to work closely with students involved in other organizations. Member of greek and non-greek organizations will have the opportunity to come together to plan, organize and carry out events that will benefit K-State as a whole.

The second main benefit that will come from the proposed student activity center is a dramatic increase in leadership development for K-State students. The center will serve as an informational center for students to find out how to get involved in the many groups K-State has to offer.

The student activity center is an opportunity we should not pass up. A maximum of $6.50 per student per semester is a small price to pay for something that will benefit so many students in so many ways. Long ago,
K-State's students invested in a vision of a Union we are fortunate to take advantage of today. We should do the same thing by investing in the SAC. We support the proposed center and feel it is sure to benefit all student organizations.

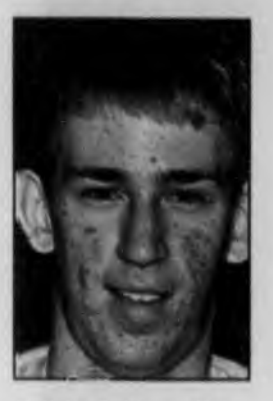
Group president encourages 'no' vote on proposed center

Editor,

Last month I was invited to "presidential dessert" that was put on to try to persuade the presidents of organizations on campus to support the student activities center.

Being the president of an organization that doesn't have its own office (Individuals for Freethought), I was interested in the idea as the meeting began. However, as it went on, I began to realize that most of the proposed benefits of the center would have, at best, minimal impact.



In fact, at one point, someone in the audience asked for a show of hands of presidents who felt they needed the center for potential office space and to carry out their respective organizational duties.

Only around four or five people raised their hands. Repeatedly, people reported they don't really need the cubicle space provided by the proposed center. The vast majority of organizations can carry out their duties without the student activities center. The center really attempts to address a problem that doesn't exist.

It is clearly a waste of valuable resources. For these reasons, I propose that students vote no Thursday.

WORD ON THE STREET

"I voted for Bush because I have always voted Republican. I like what he was doing for the party and I agreed with his stances more than I did with Gore's. My vote was for Bush because the overall view of him was better."

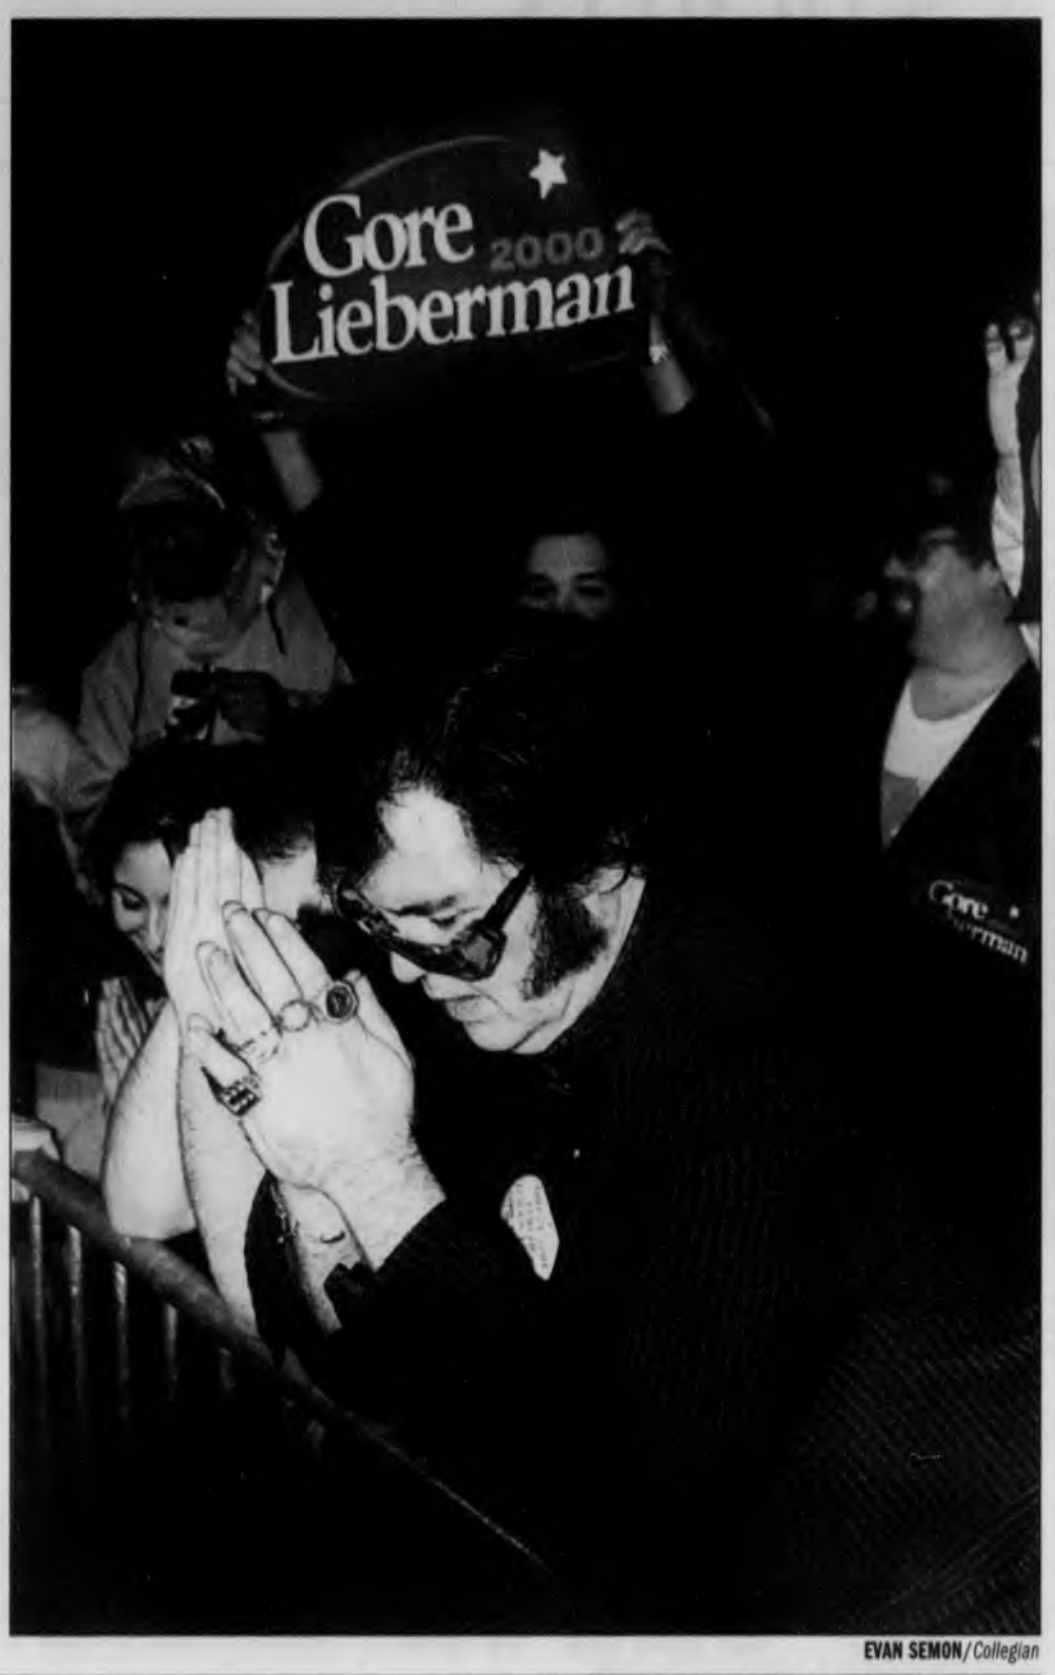
– Jeffrey Lebak, sophomore in electrical engineering

"I voted for Gore because I am very liberal. I was upset with Ralph Nader for the way he was campaigning and the way he campaigned in states where the election was very close between Gore and Bush. I basically think he shot himself in the foot, so my next logical choice was Gore."

– Taylor Miller, freshman in pro-optometry

"My vote was for Bush because I think he is a man of high morals who will lead our country in the right direction. Gore doesn't speak the truth and doesn't share the same values as I do, so I went with Bush."

– Julie Karrer, senior in life sciences



"I went with Nader because I think he is right on with his opinion that the two-party system being way to similar. I also think it is good to get funding for his party at a national level."

– Greg Spaw, sophomore in architecture

"I went with Gore because he seems to be like a down-to-earth guy who cares about the environment. Bush just scares the crap out of me because he doesn't seem real with it. He is basically a puppet for what his party wants, and Gore seems like he has more independent ideas."

– Devon Bauernfeind, junior in interior architecture

these television networks projected a winner too soon," he said. "This is a good example of when the media should have stayed silent. It is just a lesson to not get ahead of the news."

The two sides will now wait for a recount, which has yet to be determined.

"We will support Gore, if and when he is elected," Bill Daley said to the assembled crowd. "But until that point in time our campaign continues.

BUSH

"I think it's a little disappointing for the obvious reason we've been standing out here for so long," Ethan Herr, Austin, Texas, resident, said.

Allen Blake, freshman at the University of Texas, said he wasn't too surprised about Gore deciding not to give a concession speech.

"I think it's within reason," he said. "Anyone would do the same if it came down to 1,300 votes" official our campaign continues," Daley said to cheering supporters in Nashville.

Florida had been the epicenter of the campaign and Tuesday night was beyond chaotic. At midevening news organizations said Gore was the winner, but they backtracked as more votes were counted and Bush eased ahead.

Republicans maintained precarious control of Congress as the GOP bid to hold the House, Senate and presidency for the first time in 46 years.

In New York, Hillary Rodham Clinton made history, becoming the nation's first first lady to win a Senate seat. "You taught me, you tested me," Hillary Clinton told her adopted New Yorkers. "I am determined to make a difference for all of you."

TV networks projected Bush the winner, igniting GOP celebrations in Austin. An hour later, the conclusive vote they cited in Florida had tightened. The Associated Press did not declare a presidential winner, citing the ongoing tally.

Supporters in Nashville chanted, "Recount!" and indeed state law made it certain that whoever wins Florida, officials will review the vote.

In the most dramatic election in decades, it all came down to Florida. AP's analysis showed the narrowest of margins with final votes still being tallied in several Democratic counties. The networks projected a Bush victory that would put him over the top and that sparked gloom in the Gore camp in Nashville and triumphant cheers in Texas.

The election offers voters a choice of four more years of Democratic rule or a Republican "fresh start."

A Bush victory would give America its second father-son presidents after John Adams (1797-01) and John Quincy Adams (1825-29).

Florida would give Bush 271 votes in the Electoral College, one over the majority needed to claim the presidency. Just thousands of votes separated the two candidates in Florida out of almost 6 million cast, and the margin was sure to require a recount.

Four states were still to close to call: Florida, Oregon, Wisconsin and New Mexico. Gore won Iowa, a Democratic bastion that nearly went to Bush.

With Florida officials continuing their tally, the New York Times said Bush had won and congratulated him on "the amazing political feat of lapping to the White House after only six years in public office."

Republicans retained control of the Senate — if narrowly — and looked likely to keep a small majority in the House as well. Bush or Gore, the next president will be submitting his first-year agenda to a deeply divided Congress.

Gore won big battlegrounds in Pennsylvania, Michigan and California while Bush claimed Texas, Ohio and a string of smaller states, including Gore's Tennessee and Bill Clinton's Arkansas.

Green Party candidate Ralph Nader had just 3 percent of the national vote, but did well enough in to potentially tip several states to Bush.

AUSTIN, Texas — Bundled up in a red jacket with a Bush Campaign 2000 shirt over it, Diane Martin sold the Bush-Cheney buttons she and her friend had made, despite the cold, rainy weather conditions.

"It's fantastic," she said. "It's a lot of fun, except the weather stinks. We're from Florida, so we're probably going to get colds."

Martin said she and her friend had followed Gov. George W. Bush throughout Florida during his recent campaigns. During his campaigning, they had the chance to eat lunch with his brother Jeb Bush, and his mother Barbara Bush. Working for the Manatee Chamber of Commerce gave her the opportunity, along with around 100 others.

"It was really nice. It's really a wonderful family," she said.

She walked around the Austin, Texas, capitol building selling her many different buttons and "Bush 2000" Beanie Babies. Her friend, she said was a huge Bush fan, driving them to promote his candidacy.

Laura Dewitt, Dallas resident, purchased Martin's last Beanie Baby.

"We already chased Bush down to the courthouse," she said.

Purchasing the Beanie Baby was just a souvenir of Election 2000, she said. In town for a convention, she said she and her co-workers decided to come see what was going on.

"This is a historical event," said her co-worker Byron Frazier. "It's something to be a part of."

Frazier said he was for Bush all the way.

"I think it's going to be close, but I think that Bush is going to prevail," he said.

As for the weather conditions, Dewitt and Frazier said together, "I love it."

Harold Murphy, from Ottawa, Canada, said he was in town for a conference, as well. Elections in Canada were nothing like ones in America, he said.

"It's not something they follow," he said. "Canadians are different than Americans when there's elections. There's not the same kind of hype as there is here. We're just different."

Spending $4 on a Bush button, he said, was to keep as a souvenir of the event.

"It's kind of exciting to be here in Austin when Bush is running," he said. "I imagine it's going to be hectic here tonight either way."

Tennis finishes season strong

By DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

K-State's tennis team completed its fall season last week in Omaha, Neb., during the International Tennis Association's Central Region Championships on the campus of Creighton University.

Sixty-four players began play Nov. 2 with Petra Sedlmajerova, Alena Jecminkova, Kathy Chuda and Eva Novotna' competing for the Wildcats. K-State also entered three teams into doubles competition.

A trio of Cats' singles players opened up the first day of the tournament with impressive wins Thursday.

Sedlmajerova, Chuda and Novotna' advanced easily into the round of 32, but Jecminkova barely escaped the opening round, posting a narrow win over a familiar face to the Wildcat program.

Jecminkova came in with the tournament's No. 4 seed for her match against former Wildcat and current University of Denver student Martina Pospisilova.

And she needed all three sets.

After surrendering the first set to Pospisilova, 5-2, Jecminkova regrouped in time to come from behind and post 7-5 and 6-4 wins in the remaining sets to take her first match of the tournament.

Behind early and full of nerves, Jecminkova said although Pospisilova played with passion, the thought never crossed her mind that she would lose to her.

"I was pretty nervous and I think that Martina was nervous, too," Jecminkova said. "I wasn't thinking of losing the match. I knew I just had to play."

Doubles competition was productive early for K-State as well, with two of the three Wildcat teams winning easily.

K-State's third doubles combination of Paulina Castillejos and Natalia Boyko lost to Nebraska, 8-3, but No. 2-seed Novotna' and Sedlmajerova, and No. 6-seed Jecminkova and Chuda won their matches by the same score, 8-4.

After a successful first day, singles competition continued Friday with wins by top-seeded Sedlmajerova and Jecminkova, along with Novotna's three-set win against the tournament's No. 8-seed, Jodi Richardson of Brigham Young University.

However, Chuda became the first Cat casualty when she fell to the tournament's No. 2-seed, winning just three sets against Natalia Alekhova of New Mexico.

On Friday, Jecminkova advanced to the semifinals with two wins against seeded opponents before being upset by eventual champion and No. 7-seed Lenka Zacharova of Weber State, 7-6 (5), 6-4 Saturday.

"I was surprised that I played pretty well," Jecminkova said of her performance, "because I haven't practiced because of my injury."

The doubles team of Sedlmajerova and Novotna' also reached the semifinal round after four rounds of competition but lost to eventual champion and No. 3-seed Jennifer DeSpain and Jana Sedivec of Tulsa, 8-6.

When the smoke cleared at the Hanscom Tennis Center in Omaha on Saturday, head coach Steve Bietau said he was pleased with his team's performance.

"Our team members played hard," Bietau said. "I had no doubt when they step on the court that they'll play hard."

Jecminkova said the team's performance in Omaha was an example of the Cats' potential for success in the spring when the team takes to the courts again starting in mid-January.

"We saw that we are capable of being really good," she said. "I think that we can be pretty close to Oklahoma State — there aren't many differences."

Tackle performance against Iowa State earns Beisel Big 12 Player of the Week

Senior defensive end Monty Beisel was named the SBC Big 12 Conference Defensive Player of the Week on Monday with his 11-tackle performance against Iowa State on Saturday.

Beisel notched four solo stops, seven assists, three tackles for losses of nine yards, one quarterback sack, a pass deflection and two QB hurries in the Cats' 56-10 victory.

Beisel anchored a K-State front-seven that kept the Cyclones to 80 yards rushing on the day, including a mere 35 yards on the ground by Ennis Haywood, who heading into the contest was the Big 12's leading rusher with a 133 yards per game average.

The Douglass, Kan., native leads the team in both tackles (78) and sacks (10) this season. He also ranks fourth all-time on K-State's career sack list, getting the QB 21.5 times in his four years as a Wildcat.

Beisel's accolade marks his second Big 12 Player of the Week honor this season. He also earned the defensive award following his performance in the season opener vs. Iowa.

Decision delayed on K-State vs. Missouri kickoff time for Nov. 18 game in Columbia

The Nov. 18 contest pitting K-State versus Missouri will be broadcast either on Fox over-the-air syndication at 11:30 a.m. CST or regionally by ABC starting at 2:30 CST.

ABC Sports has exercised its six-day notification for its Big 12 Conference football telecast schedule for Saturday, leaving the game time for the K-State/Missouri matchup in Columbia yet to be decided. The Texas Tech/Oklahoma contest is also in the running to be aired by ABC this weekend.

Regardless, however, Saturday will mark the ninth time the Wildcat football team has appeared on television this season.

Cats capture 1st win

STORY BY DAN SMITH

Nearly 1,200 K-State basketball fans made their way to Bramlage Coliseum on Tuesday night to see the Wildcat women kick-off their exhibition season against KSC Szekszard.

And the Wildcat faithful went home happy.

After senior guard Kim Woodlee's two key free throws went down with 53.5 seconds left in the game, K-State had all the points it needed to give its guests from Bulgaria their fourth loss in as many tries, and the Cats had their first win of the year, 49-46.

Yet, despite the victory, Woodlee was still critical of the team's overall performance.

"I didn't think we played as well as we wanted to, that's for sure," she said, "but we saw a lot of good things and we know what we need to work on."

Woodlee said ball maintenance is the main key to the Wildcats' success, as the team cannot let defensive pressure disrupt their game plan.

"We need to take care of the basketball, first and foremost," Woodlee said. "We need to stay in the offense when everything's not perfect and take better shots because we didn't shoot as well from the floor as we should have."

KAREN MIKOLS/Collegian

Both teams encountered shooting troubles throughout the night with K-State finishing at a 35-percent clip.

Freshman post player Nicole Ohlde credited the Bulgarian defense for the Cats' shooting woes, as the Wildcat offense was often confused when faced with KSC Szekszard's physical defense.

"We got out of sync a lot," she said, "and you can credit their defense with that."

Coffeyville Community College transfer guard Shalondra Booker echoed her teammate's analysis, saying that a combination of factors led to K-State's low offensive output.

"One moment, they had the defense on us, and then we'd be out of our offense," the junior said.

Although K-State struggled on offense, Booker shone in her first outing in a Wildcat uniform by creating opportunities on defense with five steals and moving the ball on offense with four assists, both game-highs. Still, Booker said it wasn't her best night.

"I felt I played an OK game, but I feel that I can do better than this," she said.

Another newcomer, Ohlde, praised the crowd after scoring 10 points and pulling down five rebounds Tuesday.

"It's the most people I've ever had at a game," she said. "It's a bigger gym and a lot more people than I'm used to, but when you're out on the court and you get chills, it's good."

The Clay Center, Kan., product was greeted with cheers as her name was announced during pregame introductions, but encountered no hometown hospitality in the paint.

"It's a lot different, but it helped show me what it's going to be like," Ohlde said. "Now that I've played against a real team, it helped to show me what it's going to be like — very physical."

After the game, head coach Deb Patterson was content with her team's performance early in the game, but was hesitant to hand out praise for the remainder of the team's three-point victory.

Volleyball team to face 23rd-ranked Tigers tonight

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

Just over one month ago, K-State's volleyball team traveled to Missouri with a 3-1 conference record and a No. 24 ranking.

The Tigers sported an identical record but were not ranked and hadn't beaten the Cats in 12 matches.

Missouri knocked off the Cats in three straight games.

Fast forward to tonight. Now Missouri, ranked No. 23, faces a K-State squad that has been unranked since the two teams' previous match.

However, once again, the two teams' conference records nearly are identical.

Missouri stands in second place in the Big 12 with an 11-4 record but is just a half game ahead of the Cats, who stand at 10-4.

As a result, this game is pivotal in terms of final standings.

To put it simply, K-State needs to win, senior middle blocker Kelle Branting said.

"We've improved since then, but I'm sure they have too. It's going to be a good match," she said, "but we need to win."

In order to win, K-State will have to correct the mistakes it made in the previous match against the Tigers.

In Columbia, the Cats struggled with passing and often failed to serve the ball into play, Branting said.

"We didn't pass very well, and became predictable on offense," she said.

"We're going to have to serve tough. Quickness is kind of their strength, so we're going to have to try and take that away. We'll have to stay aggressive with our serves — we can't patty-cake around with them."

However, what the Cats won't have to do to defeat Missouri is play better than they normally play.

If K-State's players just play up to their averages, they can win the match, McLaughlin said.

"Kelle Branting is the second leading hitter in the conference, but she needs to hit better than 23-percent like she did at Texas. She needs to hit 37-percent like she has been," he said.

"We don't have to be better than normal."

The Cats also must take away Missouri's main weapons. The Tigers' 29-percent hitting is seventh best in the nation, so K-State will have to force Missouri's weaker hitters to take the majority of the shots, McLaughlin said.

"We have to force them to beat us in a way they don't want to," he said. "We have to take away their hitters."

Cats win needed for sense of tradition

SAM STIERS

K-State's football team must defeat Nebraska.

If K-State's football program is going to continue to ascend to the top of the college football elite, the Cats must pull off the upset this weekend on Wagner Field.

Now, I'm not saying that if the Cats lose, the program will revert back to the days of the "Mildcat" in the 1980s, but if K-State is going to earn the respect of fans and opponents around the nation — they need a win.

This still could be the greatest season in K-State history.

True, not even Al Gore's fuzzy math can make K-State eligible for the Orange Bowl and the national title game, but this K-State team still can accomplish something that not even the vaunted 1998 Wildcat football team did, and that's win the Big 12 title.

However, in order to get there, K-State must win the biggest game in school history. It might not have the hype that the 1998 bout between these two teams had, but it will be a more pivotal game for the program.

I was there for the former greatest game in K-State history, and what a game it was.

The electricity in the air and the roller coaster of emotions as two great teams battled back and forth.

The explosion of relief and joy as the curse was finally lifted from Manhattan as the Wildcats won, 40-30.

That game was huge, but this one is bigger. If K-State loses, it'll fall to 8-3 — and I understand most schools around the nation would love to have a record like that — but if K-State is to continue forward, it must demand more than one win every 30 years against the Huskers.

This weekend, there's more on the line than the Big 12 title and a possible 10-win season. This weekend decides what direction this program is heading. If the Cats lose, then K-State is still a fringe team, a wannabe, and, like the Spice Girls, considered a joke by traditional powerhouses.

If the Cats are able to win, though, then the Cats are back on track to forming a tradition that may someday rival other football powers.

And tradition is extremely important.

I was at the Texas A&M game this year, and despite a loss to lowly Colorado at home, the Aggie fans and players had an aura of confidence about them that comes from years of winning the "big game."

Kyle Stadium literally swayed with the crowd as everyone in the stadium — alumni and students — joined together in cheering on their team.

For K-State to reach that level of confidence and pride, K-State needs to begin to beat top-10 teams and it needs to start this weekend.

Both teams Saturday want to win in order to get a shot at the Big 12 title and a chance at beating No. 1 Oklahoma, but more than that, both teams have something to prove.

Nebraska wants to prove they're still kings of the Big 12, while K-State wants to prove their program is more than just a one-hit wonder.

Remember, no matter what happens, win or lose, this team deserves our respect. But if K-State wants to continue its rapid rise to the top of college football, fans and players must show up Saturday with more intensity and desire than they've ever displayed in their lives, and knock the king off our hill.

game well and at the level early in the season that we could sustain," she said. "The other 32 minutes of the game we didn't sustain that level, particularly on the offensive side of the ball."

Patterson also said that keeping a competitive edge throughout the game will be something the Cats will need to work on in order to continue down the right road.

"Consistency, intensity, execution, understanding score and time, making intelligent basketball decisions on every possession and putting the whole package together is going to be real important," she said.

Patterson said the Cats' success in Tuesday night's game will be used as a learning tool when K-State hits the floor again on Sunday at Bramlage, wrapping up the team's exhibition schedule with a game against Club Volna at 2 p.m.

"It's upon us to use this game to learn and to evaluate ourself on film and see what we look like against another competitor," she said.

States vote on various issues

By ARLENE LEVINSON
The Associated Press

Voters in Colorado and Oregon, still shaken by high school shooting rampages, cracked down on gun show patrons Tuesday, approving background checks on all buyers.

The Colorado measure was a response to the massacre last year at Columbine High School in Littleton, Colo., where students Eric Harris and Dylan Klebold killed 13 people and themselves. A gun show furnished part of their arsenal. It passed with 70 percent of the vote, with 35 percent of precincts reporting.

A similar gun show measure was passing in Oregon with 61 percent support, with 19 percent of the vote tallied. In 1998, a disturbed 15-year-old named Kip Kinkel killed his parents and two students with guns obtained from his father.

Sweeping proposals for private school vouchers in California and Michigan were soundly defeated. Maine voters looked set to approve gay rights protection but to reject doctor-assisted suicide. With 29 percent of precincts reporting, the gay civil rights measure was leading with 51 percent support, and the suicide proposal had 54 percent of the vote against it.

Forty-two states considered more than 200 statewide measures in Tuesday's balloting.

Nevada and Nebraska voters approved measures to define marriage for men and women only, aiming to fend off same-sex civil unions approved this year in Vermont. Nebraska's proposal also would invalidate same-sex unions recognized elsewhere.

ELECTIONS 2000

With 24 percent of Nevada precincts reporting, the man-woman marriage proposal had 69-percent support. The vote in Nebraska was 70 percent in favor, with 46 percent of precincts reporting.

An Oregon measure that sought to forbid public school teachers from encouraging, promoting or sanctioning homosexuality was failing in early returns, 51 percent to 49 percent, with 19 percent of the vote in.

Ballots were crowded with proposals to improve education — more than two dozen around the nation — but voters didn't always agree on how that should be accomplished.

Michigan rejected vouchers for children in failing districts by 70 percent, with 23 percent of precincts reporting. The proposal would have offered vouchers worth an estimated $3,300 to any child living in a district where less than two-thirds of students graduate, whether or not the child was in public school.

Californians turned down a proposal to offer every schoolchild, poor or rich, a $4,000 private school voucher. With 11 percent of precincts reporting, 54 percent rejected the voucher measure.

North Carolina approved the state's record $3.1 billion bond issue to improve higher education. With 73 percent of precincts reporting, the biggest bond issue in state history passed with 73 percent support.

New Jersey, the state that gave the nation Megan's Law, approved putting the state's sex-offender database online. With 10 percent of precincts reporting, the measure was drawing an overwhelming 80 percent support.

In Alabama, with 10 percent of precincts reporting, voters favored lifting a 99-year-old ban on interracial marriage, which had long been unenforceable. Early returns showed the measure passing by 54 percent.

Commission OKs pre-development agreement for east side

By SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
Kansas State Collegian

The Manhattan City Commission has again given a tentative nod to developers returning with a revised plan for the east side of the city.

In a unanimous vote, city commissioners voted to enter a pre-development agreement with Plaza Manhattan LLC , a subsidiary of the Chicago-based First National Development, concerning two redevelopment districts.

The commission also established Nov. 21 as the date for a public hearing regarding the districts. First National proposed a one-district redevelopment plan last spring, but the idea was voted down by the Riley County Commission in June.

Under the new proposal, one 30.3-acre development area known as the North Third Street District is bounded by Leavenworth Street on the south, Fourth Street on the west, Laramie Street on the north and Tuttle Creek Boulevard on the east. This area is planned as housing and an anchor retail store, possibly Target, plus smaller retail establishments.

The other area, East Side Business District, of 80.5 acres is bounded by McCall Road on the south, Levee Drive on the north and the Riley County/Pottawotomie County line on the west. This location is proposed to have a more industrial function, containing the new Manhattan Steel and Pipe facilities.

Joe Norton, of Gilmore & Bell, acting as bond counselor for the city, said the decision is non-binding at this point.

"Really creating the redevelopment district does nothing more than establish boundaries," he said.

Norton said there are six necessary decision points before the city is fully committed. The first one was the commission's Tuesday night decision and the second will be presented at the public forum Nov. 21.

The following four decisions will require the approval of the Riley and Pottawotomie County Commissions, the local board of education, the city planning board and the city commission again.

"I think at any point in time, if one those hurdles is not crossed, the project stops," Norton said.

Members of the audience still voiced concerns, especially of the tax scenario.

Under the plan, the redevelopment would operate under tax increment financing.

Under TIF, a developer would still pay the original property value of the land. Any property tax value added with development would also be paid by the developer, but the money is guaranteed to be reinvested by the city for infrastructure improvements in that area.

Vic Miller, a Topeka attorney representing 19 businesses in the eastern portion of the redevelopment , said TIF is dangerous if the developer does nothing and property values are frozen in place.

Incentives also need to be in the agreement, he said, that the developers discuss with displaced residents and business owners where they will be placed during and after development.

Ruth Schrum, who owns businesses and apartments in the Third Street district, said she opposed the entire proposal.

Schrum said the city was catering to a large corporation by handing established property over.

"My husband and I have an investment plan and you are wrecking it," she said, "This isn't the free enterprise system at all."

Commissioner Roger Reitz said he was voting for the agreement and hearing to see what would develop.

"I don't think we can make any judgment calls on anything we've heard until we have the whole program in front of us," he said.

Governor's widow defeats Republican incumbent for Missouri Senate seat

The Associated Press

ST. LOUIS — Missourians elected a dead man to the Senate on Tuesday, choosing Gov. Mel Carnahan — who perished three weeks ago in a plane crash — over Republican incumbent John Ashcroft. Carnahan's widow had agreed to take her husband's place.

With 84 percent of precincts reporting early Wednesday, Carnahan had 1,075,872 votes, or 50 percent. Ashcroft, a Republican, had 1,039,409, or 49 percent.

The plane crash that killed Carnahan, his son and an aide last month turned the nationally watched contest against Republican Sen. John Ashcroft from notoriously bitter to bizarre.

The crash occurred too late to revise the ballot. No one had ever posthumously won election to the Senate, though voters on at least three occasions sent deceased candidates to the House.

Gov. Roger Wilson, who took office after Carnahan's death Oct. 16, said he would appoint Carnahan's 66-year-old widow, Jean, to a two-year term should Ashcroft lose.

Jean Carnahan became the implicit challenger when she declared herself strong enough to accept appointment.

Some Republicans had threatened a court challenge if that happened.

Early Wednesday, as her husband pulled ahead, she addressed hundreds of St. Louis-area supporters by phone from her home in Rolla.

"You have stayed the course; you have kept the faith; you have carried our hopes and dreams," she said.

"Lincoln never saw his nation made whole again. Susan B. Anthony never cast a vote. Martin Luther King never finished his mountaintop journey. My husband's journey was cut short, too. And for reasons we don't understand, the mantle has now fallen upon us," she said.

Ashcroft, 58, resumed his campaign eight days after the crash, airing his own new TV ad featuring former Sen. John Danforth, a mentor, telling Missourians, "What's happening today to John Ashcroft is just not right."

Meanwhile, the late governor's campaign spent $700,000 to broadcast Jean Carnahan making a direct appeal to voters to keep her husband's vision alive.

She answered a dozen questions in writing from The Associated Press, describing views in favor of abortion rights, gun control and other issues, all reflecting stands by her husband in direct opposition to Ashcroft's.

In St. Louis, long lines of voters led a state judge, at Democrats' request, to order the city to keep its polls open until 10 p.m., three extra hours. A shortage of booths, ballots, judges and equipment had vexed the city throughout the day.

But the Board of Election Commissioners appealed swiftly, and a three-judge panel of the Missouri Court of Appeals ordered the polls closed immediately — after they had been open nearly an extra hour.

Both popular vote-getters elected twice as Missouri governor, Carnahan and Ashcroft were politically like night and day.

Ashcroft, a favorite of religious conservatives when he mulled a White House bid, signed restrictive abortion laws as governor that later were upheld by the U.S. Supreme Court. Carnahan, who served one term as Ashcroft's lieutenant governor and succeeded Ashcroft, vetoed further abortion restrictions as well as concealed weapons legislation.

For years, Missouri political analysts and observers have remarked on the dislike between the two, although Ashcroft and Carnahan both denied it.

Their campaign featured allegations of racism against Ashcroft and a response that included a 40-year-old photo of Carnahan in blackface. They also battled over capital punishment, a controversy generated by Carnahan's decision, at Pope John Paul II's behest, to commute a murderer's death sentence.

Clinton becomes only first lady ever elected to public office

By MARC HUMBERT
The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Hillary Rodham Clinton triumphed in her historic quest for the U.S. Senate, defeating homegrown GOP Rep. Rick Lazio on Tuesday to become the only first lady ever elected to public office.

Just before 11 p.m. Tuesday, with 51 percent of precincts counted, Clinton had 1,698,421 votes, or 54 percent; Lazio had 1,423,562 votes, or 45 percent.

"You came out and said that issues and ideals matter," Clinton told a cheering crowd minutes later. In the wings, her husband, the president, watched and grinned.

"I am profoundly grateful to all of you for giving me the chance to serve you," she said. "I will do everything I can to be worthy of your faith and trust and to honor the powerful example of Sen. Daniel Patrick Moynihan."

ELECTIONS 2000

The campaign, which pitted her against a powerhouse New York City mayor and then a lesser-known Republican congressman, was the longest and costliest race in the state's history.

It saw issues of character, place of birth, marital fidelity and campaign finance collide with discussion of education, Social Security and the state's economy.

But Clinton herself — her activism, her issues, her president husband and her love-it-or-hate-it personality — proved to be the main issue in the campaign against the Long Island congressman to replace retiring Democrat Moynihan.

"She overcame the skeptics and worked and worked and won," Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., said at the Manhattan hotel serving as Clinton's election-night headquarters.

Lazio, in conceding, called for unity and pronounced the effort worthwhile.

"I feel like the Mets," he said, invoking the losers of New York City's subway series last month. Behind him, Gov. George Pataki and Mayor Rudolph Giuliani applauded.

"She has won this race," Lazio said of Clinton. "It's time for us to stand as New Yorkers together."

Clinton's planning for the Senate race began in the living quarters of the White House in February of last year when she met for several hours with New York political veteran Harold Ickes, a former White House deputy chief of staff during President Clinton's first term.

That very day, the Senate voted on whether to remove her husband, an impeachment triggered by his affair with Monica Lewinsky.

By early July, she was at Moynihan's upstate New York farm receiving his blessing and kicking off a summer-long "listening tour" of New York. In January, she moved into a $1.7 million house she and the president had bought in suburban Westchester County.

At the time, the likely Republican candidate was New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani.

But the "clash of the titans" wasn't to be. Giuliani never seemed to warm to the campaign. By mid-May, he was out of the race, battling prostate cancer and beset by marital woes.

Coming off the GOP bench, Lazio literally fell flat on his face, a Memorial Day parade mishap which left him with a fat lip and stitches. But within days, Lazio was running almost even with Clinton in the polls and amassing a campaign war chest that would soon surpass the first lady's own impressive lode.

By mid-October, the two had spent a combined $58.6 million in the race. With the $19 million spent by Giuliani added in, the race became among the most expensive Senate campaigns in history.

Lazio advertised himself as the "real New Yorker," a moderate Republican who traveled the state on a bus called "The Mainstream Express." In fund-raising letters, he denounced the Clintons for "embarrassing the nation." Republican allies said the first lady wanted to use the Senate seat as a stepping stone to run for president.

Clinton repeatedly sought to portray Lazio as out of step with New Yorkers, noting that he had served as a deputy whip under former House Speaker Newt Gingrich.

On Tuesday morning, as voters headed to the polls, Republican Gov. George Pataki's wife said Giuliani's failure to get out of the race sooner was "selfish" and hurt Lazio's chances.

Students work to prioritize activities as fall semester nears completion

By JESSICA PITTS
Kansas State Collegian

The end of the fall semester is nearing, and for students like Caressa Bingham, senior in speech language pathology, that means more stress.

Bingham, who is graduating in December, said she is having trouble balancing planning a graduation party, finding a job, filling out graduate school applications and dealing with her current classes.

"Those are my major stresses right now," Bingham said. "Everything just needs to be done at once and it is hard to prioritize."

Arthur Rathbun, counselor and biofeedback specialist, said this part of the year usually is the most stressful time for students because of finals and the holiday season.

"Really, it is a combination of things that cause stress for students as we move towards finals and the holiday season," Rathbun said. "Most students find that they are way overextending themselves, and the result is that something has to suffer which is usually their sleep or health."

Bingham said she is giving up a lot of weekend time to prepare for her graduation party.

"I spent all of last weekend booking hotel rooms for my family, finding a place for the reception and addressing invitations," Bingham said. "It really takes away from time I could be spending on school work or filling out graduate school applications."

Rathbun said he thinks students should learn to prioritize to help relieve some of the stress.

"A lot of students are becoming more wise and learning that they have to choose what is most important and what things they may need help on," he said.

Bingham, who plans to work for six months before attending graduate school, said she passed her job search onto a temporary agency to help relieve some of the pressure on her.

"It was hard to look for a job because I only needed it for six months," she said. "Since they are handling it for me, I am able to concentrate more on my graduate school applications because they take up so much of my time."

Rathbun said another cause of stress this time of year is the uncertainty of the upcoming season or semester.

"Some students are on the bubble where their grades may go up or down a letter depending on their performance on the final. They have a lot more riding on their shoulders than just a regular test," Rathbun said. "For other students, it may be what classes to enroll in next semester or if they will find a summer internship."

For Ryan Delker, senior in electrical engineering, the uncertainty is where he is going to find a job when he graduates in May.

"Right now I don't know where I am going to be living after next semester," Delker said. "My stress is that it is hard to balance finding a job and school because I have to travel out of state for the interviews."

Delker said he tries to do his assignments early if he knows he is going to miss school, but that is not always possible.

"Sometimes it comes down to just not having time to do them at all," he said. "That definitely doesn't help my schoolwork, but finding a job for after graduation is important right now."

Rathbun said students can take several easy steps to help them feel more relaxed during this stressful part of the semester.

"First of all, they just need to take a break. They can take a short one and go to the Rec or just take a nap. This will help them refresh for the next round," he said. "But if the stressful situation continues, they should come into the counseling centers office for some help."

Rathbun said they do see an increase in the amount of students in their office during this time of year.

"We basically just help them sort through things and help them deal with their problems," he said. "We help them come to some form of decision making which should relieve some of the stress."

Rathbun said if students don't want to see a counselor personally, they can go to the University Counseling Services Web page to download some relaxation tapes.

"These are some temporary solutions," he said. "They really help just calm you down and prepare you for stressful situations."

Rathbun said it is important for students to find what form of stress relieving works for them before everything hits at once.

"If you try things out and know how to handle your stress it will be a lot easier when it finally hits," he said. "You could be avoiding getting sick or overloaded by taking precautions early."

'A FUNNY THING'

STORY BY CHELSEA SCHMIDT

KSU Theatre and the Department of Music are doing things a little differently for this year's musical.

They won't be presenting a drama, a romance or one of Shakespeare's works.

Instead, they will be putting on a complete and total farce, said Charlotte MacFarland, director of "A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to the Forum."

"It's just really funny," MacFarland said. "A farce is extreme, and we haven't tried to pull it back any. It's completely silly."

The musical is based on the plays of Plautus, a Roman comic playwright who is remembered as the creator of domestic comedy, MacFarland said.

"He was the first to depict the lives of ordinary people and make them absurd," she said.

"A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to the Forum," describes the comical plight of Pseudolus, a smart slave whose only desire is to be free.

The presentation of this musical will stray from what musical-goers are used to viewing at McCain Auditorium, MacFarland said.

Audience members will have numerous opportunities to interact with the characters. They will be mingling with the audience in the lobby before the production and during intermission acting as their characters, MacFarland said.

"We have added a lot of improv and puns," she said. "It's that kind of humor."

MacFarland said the content of the musical can be offensive.

"It does have things that will offend people," she said. "But, it's mild compared to what's on TV. I'm not sure that modern audiences would be offended."

Aubrey Kershner, fifth-year senior in theater and public relations and interim marketing director of KSU Theatre, said the commitment and time the 20 actors put in is what will be evident to the audience members.

This commitment is especially evident in Chance Mullen, junior in theater, who will be playing the lead character.

Mullen's mother died three weeks into the rehearsal of the show.

"Things were getting rough since the beginning of the school year," he said. "I had to make a decision before she passed away."

That decision was to continue with the show, even if that meant he wouldn't be there when she died.

"My dad talked to my mom, and they said to stay in the show and we'd work it out," Mullen said. "The decision was tough because I didn't know what was going to happen."

After talking with his family, Mullen said he decided the show must go on.

Since making the decision, Mullen has been working to make this production a success.

He said humor will play a big part in entertaining the audience.

"No matter what, you're going to laugh," Mullen said.

Kershner said she agreed.

"It's a laugh-out-loud comedy," she said. "It's better than anything they can see on TV."

A number of people have come together working to make the three performances next week successful, Kershner said. Not only are the actors busy perfecting their performances, but there is also an orchestra pit and a team working on designing and creating costumes.

"The costumes are wild," she said. "They have been stitching away down in McCain."

The cast of the musical did encounter one problem as far as scheduling the three performances this week. Because kickoff for the Nebraska football game has been changed to 6:10 p.m. Saturday, the cast of the musical had to change their final performance to a matinee. This decision was made to avoid losing half of the orchestra, who also play in the K-State Marching Band.

"We're hoping people might use it as a pregame activity," MacFarland said. "We've planned to make some Cornhusker jokes."

MacFarland said she encourages everyone to attend the musical. She said it will be a chance for them to just enjoy a different type of production.

"I hope you just sat there and have forgotten all your cares and laughed your head off," she said.

Mullen said he agreed that the musical is a must-see.

"It's a type of musical that not many people will get a chance to see because it's so fun and out there," he said. "It's super-funny."

Harvard repertory theater group to deliver fairy tale for adult audiences in McCain

By LYNNE HERMANSEN
Kansas State Collegian

Live music, colorful displays and masterful puppetry will fill the stage Sunday evening at McCain Auditorium.

The theatrical production of "The King Stag," directed by Andrei Serban, will be presented by the American Repertory Theatre, from Cambridge, Mass.

"It's one of the best repertory theaters in the country," said Thom Jackson, marketing and developing director for McCain. "The actors are part of the highly regarded drama department from Harvard."

Richard Martin, director of McCain, said "The King Stag" has toured in various regions of the United States, Japan and Europe.

"It has received high praise from critics and audiences everywhere," he said.

The production is an 18th century fairy tale geared for an adult audience.

"The story is centuries old," Jackson said. "This is a fairy tale, which is not aimed for children, so I would not recommend children seeing it. There are adult themes such as love, betrayal and deception."

He said the story plot consists of a king and his unrequited love, the king's deceptive prime minister and sprinkles of magic throughout the play.

"You feel for the king because he is in love with a woman he can't have," Jackson said.

Julie Taymor is the choreographer for the production and constructed the costumes, masks and puppetry which are used for the play.

Taymor also was the first woman to win two Tony awards for directing a musical theater production for her Broadway production, "The Lion King."

Jackson said "The King Stag" is one of Taymor's earlier works.

"For those who saw 'The Lion King,' they will see that some of the styles in both productions are the same," he said.

The play includes several contributions add to its originality, Martin said.

"There are elements of various cultures, such as Indonesia and Japan," he said. "Many traditions are brought together."

Jackson said it is an exciting show for an audience to see.

"The audience has the chance to see many different parts of theater that aren't always presented in every theatrical piece," Jackson said.

Martin said the production is rare.

"There are lots of talented and nationally well-known names associated with this play," he said. "It is also a visually striking piece to see."

Jackson said he urges people to come see the play.

"Entertainment of this caliber coming to Manhattan only happens once in a blue moon," he said. "It's a very good story, a visual spectacle that the audience will be shocked as to how wonderful it is."

PRODUCTION INFO
The performance is 7 p.m. Sunday at McCain. Tickets are $30/$26 for the general public, $28/$24 for seniors and $15/$13 for students and can be ordered at the McCain Box Office or by calling 532-6428.

Manhattan resident commits time to local polls

By JAMIE BARRETT
Kansas State Collegian

Since 1960, one Manhattan woman has devoted much of her time and effort to local politics and voters.

"I have been working at voting precincts for 40 years now," said Mary Lou Newsome, supervising judge over voting precinct 5-9. "I don't just work national elections, I work off-year elections, primary elections and even school board elections."

Newsome said she and her husband, Bob, moved to Manhattan in 1960 and ever since she has been involved with elections in one way or another.

"It is hard for them to find workers for election days," Newsome said. "When I started my son was 3, and I thought I would do something good to help out the community."

Newsome began as a volunteer, but has worked her way up to supervising judge over her precinct at Amanda Arnold Elementary School. She said her responsibilities and duties have increased over the years.

"I have been on the go since Monday," Newsome said. "The Monday before elections we go to election school and are instructed on what to do and what changes have been made. This morning I was at the courthouse by 6 a.m. to pick up the ballots and start getting things ready."

Election proceedings have changed drastically over the years due to new technology, Newsome said.

"I was around when we would have to count every single ballot," she said. "There was a time when we had 11 different ballots for an election. We would have to tally them all individually according to state, federal, county and so on."

Newsome has seen the whole process for counting ballots change during the time she has worked as well.

"Before we had electronic scanners for determining results we had to stay up all night counting the ballots," Newsome said. "I used to come home at 5 a.m. after an election night. Now, being done by 10 p.m. is nothing, and it is a much easier process."

COMMUNITY
Who: Mary Lou Newsome
Position: Supervising judge over voting precinct 5-9

Over the years, Newsome said she has seen changes in younger and older voters and that the differences also depend upon the precinct.

"There has been a definite increase in younger voters over the years," she said. "Students and young adults seem to care about their government more in recent years."

Newsome said mostly business people and professionals come to vote in the precincts she works in, but she does see a fair amount of students throughout the day.

In a college town, there are a lot of students who vote through absentee ballots, but many reregister and cast their ballots in Manhattan.

"There is always a huge turnout for elections, especially for presidential," Newsome said. "People tend to turn out less for off years."

Newsome's involvement with elections and politics is not just professional, it also is personal.

"My husband is a county commissioner, and I have gotten a lot of opportunities to get even more involved through his campaigning and career," she said.

Newsome said her interest in Manhattan politics has been generated largely due to the people she works with.

"I am a people person," Newsome said. "I like seeing the people who come to vote and I like working with the other women who work at the precinct."

Janet Bowman, Manhattan resident and precinct worker, said she got involved with working election precincts through Newsome and her husband.

"I got involved because I was the treasurer for Bob's campaign," Bowman said. "I got a taste of politics and thought this would be a positive way to help out with the election process."

Newsome said the long days she must devote to being a supervising judge are well worth her time.

"I have fun doing all of this," she said. "It is a long day, but I do not mind."

Newsome said she has enjoyed working voting precincts for one main reason.

"I am very much a people person," she said. "I do not work so I am able to spend a lot of my time doing this. I love seeing and meeting people."

Newsome's positive attitude rubs off on all the people around her, said Mary Schindler, Manhattan resident and precinct worker.

"Mary Lou really is a people person because she knows everyone," Schindler said. "She says hi to everyone and always has a different patriotic sweater to wear."

Since she has been involved with elections and voting for so long, Newsome said she is an advocate for getting people to come out and vote.

"This is an opportunity to have a voice," Newsome said. "We are a democratic society, and citizens should take advantage of their opportunity to express their voice."

For Newsome, being involved for so long has led to a positive view of politics.

"I like doing this," she said. "I am actively involved with my husband's campaign and I just like being involved. I enjoy politics and I definitely enjoy my job."

privilege fee surplus. It began three years ago to aid campus organizations in need of emergency funding.

University revenues generated as a result of increased student enrollment would contribute $2.2 million to the center. If the center is approved, Worcester said the KSU Foundation would commit to a $500,000 fund-raising effort for the project, which could decrease the privilege fee.

Voting will take place in the Union Courtyard from 7 a.m. to 7 p.m. Students must bring their K-State student IDs to vote.

The paper ballot will ask students if they would agree to pay the fee and if they would allow for the privilege fee surplus to contribute to the project. Sixty-percent approval of those that vote must be acquired for the referendum to pass. Lenkner said this will assure that students are willing to support the proposal.

"I think the 60 percent rule was put in place years ago to hold student government accountable," he said.

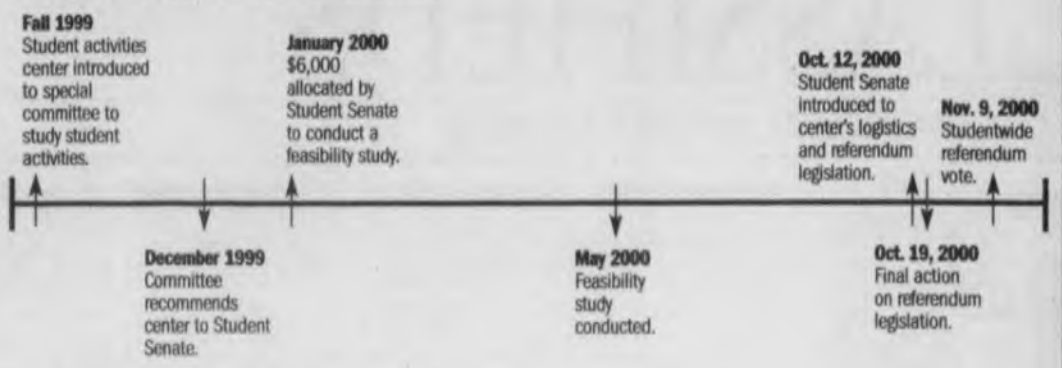
If it acquires approval, the Kansas Board of Regents and Kansas Legislature also will have to endorse the center. Construction of the center would begin next fall, Worcester said. It would be completed by Fall 2003.

Following Student Senate approval of the referendum bill Oct. 19, more than six representatives of the center have been explaining the proposal to campus groups. Worcester said about 60 groups were visited and there were three open forums. He said students seem to believe the benefits of the center outweigh its costs.

"We've had a very positive response," Worcester said.

College of Business Senator Sara Hayhurst said there still are a lot of uninformed students. She said visiting campus organizations was a good idea, but she said some of the logistics still might be unclear.

"A lot of people still don't understand," she said. "Unfortunately, time is not really an option since student senate decided to vote on it this semester."



The 16,525 square ft. building would have three floors and 24-hour access for all campus organizations. There would be 120 cubicle spaces for student groups. Office space will be provided for Union Program Council, Greek Affairs, the Multicultural Student Organizations office and Student Governing Association.

The center also would include copiers, computers, fax machines and other office equipment. Professional advising, conference rooms, a secretarial staff, work rooms and storage space also will be features.

Lenkner said students should consider the effort that has gone into planning the center when they make their decision. He said the proposal has been researched since 1994.

"This is a visionary project and it is hard to promote," he said. "This is a project that totally benefits students."

Gore camp awaits recount

■ Nashville excited as it awaits final vote counts.

By NICK BRATKOVIC
Kansas State Collegian

NASHVILLE — There was a light drizzle as Florida officials continued to recount the number of votes.

The city was abuzz with talk of the election.

Shane Lawrence, a University of Mississippi student, said the way the election has played out is amazing.

"I never thought that Gore would win the popular vote and lose the electoral vote," he said. "I thought it would be the other way around. But it is still not over."

Nashville resident Jim Schmidt said the election's closeness is remarkable.

"It is amazing that 1,200 votes will decide the person who is the leader of the free world," he said.

In an afternoon press conference, President Bill Clinton echoed similar sentiments.

"It put to rest the notion that my vote doesn't count," Clinton said. "I was like all of you. I was a fascinated observer last night."

Lawrence said he will not soon forget the events of the past 24 hours as he stood in the War Memorial Plaza.

"We heard that he conceded and started saying stay and fight, and then he recanted his concession and we started chanting 'President Gore,'" he said. "It is the most historic thing I will ever see or be a part of. I was standing on the steps."

Chris Fort, a Nashville resident who was touring the grounds, said he agreed.

"It is historic," he said. "I never thought I would see this in my lifetime."

People walked around the historic War Memorial Plaza as construction crews began to tear down the historic stage — a stage on which Gore was unable to make history.

Regardless of the outcome of this election, Clinton said he was proud of the candidates.

"I want to congratulate both Vice President Gore and George W. Bush on a vigorous, hard-fought campaign," Clinton said.

Crews dismantle one of the media stands on the steps of the state Capitol in Austin, Texas, on Wednesday morning before the next president was known.

Camps close, uncertainty remains

By NANCY FOSTER
Kansas State Collegian

AUSTIN, Texas — At around 1:30 a.m. Wednesday morning, the announcement that Texas Gov. George W. Bush would be the new president boomed across the speakers in front of the Capitol in Austin. Shortly after, Vice President Al Gore retracted his comments to Bush and decided not to give a concession speech.

With a margin of only 1 percent of the popular vote, the race was later determined as too close to call. Florida's votes were not completely tallied yet, making it impossible to declare a winner.

The roller coaster of emotions that followed has caused many to lay blame on the news media.

Karl Rove, Bush's campaign adviser, told reporters Wednesday morning that the media determined the outcome prematurely — awarding candidates to states that were too close to call.

"I think that their standards were different for one set of states than another," he said.

He said they would award states that were really close to one of the candidates, while not awarding states that were not as close.

Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, brother to George W. Bush, also criticized the way the media handled the election. He said it was unfair to both candidates, announcing a winner before the votes were all tallied.

With 100 percent of the Florida's vote calculated, both candidates were tied with 49 percent of its popular vote. Bush received 2,909,173 votes, while Gore received 2,907,416 votes.

If Bush wins Florida, he will win the presidency, assuming electors vote the same way. Those results might challenge views of the Electoral College. It would mean Gore, who won the popular vote by more than 192,000, would lose the race.

To avoid any conflict of interest, Jeb Bush announced Wednesday he would not be on the committee in charge of Florida's recount.

One Austin resident said there was one thing she was learning in this election, and that was how the media chose to portray things.

"We're not sure if it was more about the election than the media," said Barbara Radle.

She said she was dissatisfied with how the media handled the results. Each station she turned to was more concerned with breaking

AT A GLANCE

■ The recount in all 67 Florida counties was triggered by state law because Republican Bush led Democrat Gore by less than one-half of 1 percentage point. State officials said they expect to finish by the end of the day Thursday.

■ The Florida totals, including all absentee ballots received so far, showed Bush with 2,909,135 votes and Gore with 2,907,351 – a difference of 1,784 in a state with 8.75 million registered voters.

■ After 32 of Florida's 67 counties were recounted Wednesday, Gore had gained 843 votes.

■ Americans cast more than 101 million votes, the second most in history behind the 104 million of 1992. But the race came down to one state – Florida – and a few thousand people.

■ In one heavily Democratic county, officials said 19,120 ballots in the presidential race were tossed out before they were counted because more than one candidate was picked.

■ Even before the recount, the campaign was eyeing legal options for forcing a new vote in heavily Democratic Palm Beach County, where confusion over how to fill out the ballot may have boosted the totals for Pat Buchanan, a senior Gore adviser said, speaking on condition of anonymity.

■ Florida elections supervisors also waited for an undetermined number of overseas ballots, primarily from military personnel and their families. The state allows 10 days after the election for the ballots to come in.

■ Jesse Jackson said he got calls on Election Day complaining that blacks had difficulty voting in Florida and other Southern states.

■ If Bush ends up winning Florida and Gore's lead in the national popular vote holds, Bush would be the fourth man in history – the first in more than a century – to win the presidency despite coming in second in popular votes.

■ Gore conceded defeat Tuesday night in a telephone call to Bush but called later to take it back after results rolled in from Florida. "Let me make sure I understand," protested Bush, his victory speech in hand. "You're calling me back to retract your concession?" Replied Gore: "You don't have to get snippy about this."

Ongoing race spurs creation of candidate paraphernalia

AUSTIN, Texas — Outside of the Quizno's Subs shop, a sign sat in front of the door with the words "Who's on first? Who's on second? Who's the president?" written in chalk.

The sign reflects the attitude many are beginning to take when one day after Election Day, the next U.S. president is still undetermined.

Bob Williams, mint director of Silver Creations, capitalized on the opportunity with the creation of his special coin.

On one side of the silver coin is a etched portrait of Vice President Al Gore in front of the White House. On the other side, is a portrait of Gov. George W. Bush. He said six weeks ago, he began producing the coins when he felt the election would be a close call.

The election is still a flip of a coin between George W. Bush and Al Gore. The state of Florida is in the process of doing a recount and figuring the absentee ballots.

Student SAC referendum today in Union

■ Voters must bring student IDs to decide on possible fee increase.

By BRYAN SCRIBNER
Kansas State Collegian

Students will decide today if a $6.50 per semester privilege fee for the next 15 years will fund a student activities center.

The campuswide referendum vote will be from 7 a.m. to 7 p.m. in the Union Courtyard, next to Union Station. The paper ballot will ask students if they agree to paying the fee and using a $750,000 privilege fee surplus to fund the project.

University revenues generated as a result of increased student enrollment would contribute $2.2 million to the center. The center would cost $4.8 million.

If it is approved, Student Body President Jake Worcester said the KSU Foundation would commit to a $500,000 fund-raising effort for the center. This contribution could decrease the privilege fee by as much as $1 per student.

VOTE
Vote today in the Union Courtyard from 7 a.m. to 7 p.m.

Bill Harlan, Student Senate operations chair, said students must bring their K-State student IDs to vote. Sixty-percent approval of those who vote must be acquired for the referendum to pass.

Harlan said scannable ballots will allow results to be announced before 8 p.m. at the senate meeting tonight.

He said students are welcome to attend the meeting, which is at 7 p.m. in the Union Big 12 Room.

Senate Chair Travis Lenkner said referendum voting usually encourages a good turnout. He said a proposed stadium expansion voted on in 1997 had about 5,000 student voters.

Worcester said referendums traditionally attract more voters than the Student Senate elections each spring. He said this will be a significant decision.

"I expect there to be a very good turnout," he said. "There's a chance for students to invest in the future."

The 16,525-square-foot building would have three floors and 24-hour access for all campus organizations.

Office space will be provided for Union Program Council, Greek Affairs, the Multicultural Student Organizations and Student Governing Association.

Every floor will contain cubicle spaces for student groups. There would be 120 of these spaces available. Professional advising, conference rooms, a secretarial staff, work rooms, storage space and office equipment also will be features.

If students endorse the center, approval from the Kansas Board of Regents and Kansas Legislature also will be necessary. Construction of the center would begin next fall. It would be completed by fall 2003.

Harlan said the center will have a positive effect on future K-State students.

"It's the opportunity for students to make an impact on the student life experience in the future," he said.

Other universities' centers also rested on student vote

By NANCY HULL
Kansas State Collegian

Other universities are already familiar with the pros and cons of student activity centers similar to K-State's proposed center. There are similarities and differences between student activity centers on other campuses and the plans for K-State's possible center.

Iowa State University's student activities center has existed since 1996. Funding for the addition, which is located in the basement of Iowa State's Student Union, comes from a Union debt service fund. The Union is funded by $3.90, which is taken out of students' tuition every semester, Iowa State Student Body President Ben Golding said. Iowa State's Union differs from K-State's because it's an independent corporation owned by the students.

The center has two separate offices that include about 50 cubicles and 10 offices each.

"The 100 cubicles are usually filled up every semester," Golding said. "We only turn down five or six organizations."

Computer labs and office supplies are available in the center. Iowa State's center also includes an office that handles finances for all of the center's organizations.

Golding said the services available

RCPD reviews robbery, releases suspect sketch

The Riley County Police Department has released a composite sketch of the suspect involved in an armed robbery Tuesday.

Employees of the First Bank at 1800 Claflin Ave., Suite 100, described the suspect as a white man in his late 40s or early 50s, standing approximately 6 feet tall and weighing 160 to 180 lbs., with short gray hair and a grey mustache. The suspect wore silver square-framed glasses, a blue ball cap with white lettering on the front and back, a grey sweatshirt and blue nylon pants with cargo pockets.

Anyone with information regarding the crime can contact the RCPD at 537-2108 or Riley County Crime Stoppers at 539-7777.

Man arrested, charged with drug management

A man who fled from police Tuesday evening after being pulled over for suspected drug management was captured west of Wamego on Wednesday afternoon.

A Kansas Highway Patrol man pulled over two men Tuesday evening just west of Wamego at the intersection of U.S. Highway 24 and Colombian Road with intentions of executing a search warrant.

One man was taken into custody by the Drug Enforcement Agency at the scene and the other man escaped on foot, a representative of the Pottowatomie County Police Department said.

Police searched for the man, who is thought to be in his mid 50s, into Wednesday morning, and called off the search at 8 a.m.

Pottowatomie police received a call from a man Wednesday afternoon, who believed a man who came to his house asking for a ride to Manhattan, fit the description of the suspect.

When police arrived at the residence four miles west of Wamego on Military Trail Road, a short foot chase led to the suspect's capture about 150 yards from the residence.

DEA agents took the suspect into custody. Charges against the suspect and his identity have not been released.

Abortion doctor fights to keep Nebraska clinic

BELLEVUE, Neb. — The doctor at the center of a U.S. Supreme Court case over what abortion foes call "partial-birth" abortions is trying to head off eviction from his clinic.

In May, a partnership of three people opposed to abortion, including state Sen. Paul Hartnett of Bellevue, bought the building used by Dr. LeRoy Carhart. They want to evict Carhart, who is one of only three doctors in Nebraska known to perform abortions.

Carhart has gone to court, arguing that his lease allows him first right to buy the building.

The partnership's ownership of the building has also led to Carhart's daughter being evicted from her apartment, located in a house on the clinic's property.

Building inspectors placed an "uninhabitable" placard at the house on Oct. 24, and the chief building inspector Steve Carmichael said it would remain there until code violations, included substandard electrical work deemed an electrocution hazard, were corrected, forcing all three tenants to move out.

Carhart challenged Nebraska's law banning partial-birth abortions. In June, the Supreme Court struck down the ban, ruling that the law created an undue burden on a woman's right to end a pregnancy.

Carhart performs more than 1,200 abortions a year, of which he says about 20 employ the "partial-birth" procedure, which involves cutting the skull of a fetus and draining its contents before extracting the body.

In May, an anti-abortion group sent letters to 13 area mayors, asking them to take a stand against Carhart moving to their communities. And in October, the University of Nebraska Medical Center said it is dropping Carhart as a volunteer faculty member.

Judge OKs eBay's Web sales of bootleg tunes

SAN FRANCISCO — A judge ruled online auctioneer eBay Inc. cannot be sued for allowing people to sell bootlegged audio recordings on its Web site.

In a ruling late Tuesday, a judge dismissed a lawsuit brought by a Grateful Dead fan who sought to stop sales of illegal concert recordings of the band.

The litigation did not focus on copyright infringement as has the Napster Inc. case. In that suit, the recording industry is suing Napster in federal court for allegedly contributing to copyright infringement by allowing millions of users to download copyrighted music over the Internet for free.

In dismissing the suit, Pollak said he based his ruling on the Communications Decency Act, which forbids computer service providers for being punished for the speech of others.

Courts have found that America Online Inc., for example, was immune from a suit brought by a mother who discovered pornographic pictures of her young boy offered for sale online.

EBay attorney Jay Monahan said the ruling allows it "to continue to operate our business and not fear facing liability at every turn."

"It seemed like there was going to be a lot of swing states, a lot of undecided," he said. "That's when the idea came to me."

The undecided voters was who he geared his coins toward.

"I figured the people could flip the coin as they go to the ballots," he said.

Williams created tens of thousands of the coins, and on Monday arrived in Austin to begin selling them. So far, he said, the sales were good, and so was the response to them.

"The reaction is, 'That's neat,' or 'I need one of those,'" he said. "A lot of people flip them to see what comes up."

Those who were decided, he said, just flipped the coin to the side they favored.

If the results come in and determine Bush the winner, he said, he would create new coins, using the same design as he did for Bush's father in the 1988 election. That is, Bush in front of the White House with the words 43rd president framing it.

If the results determine Gore the winner, he said the design would probably be Gore standing with Clinton in front of the White House, framed by the words 43rd president.

Either way, the coins should be completed in time for the inauguration, he said.

The $10 silver coin would be a good souvenir no matter which candidate won, he said.

"I think it will have pretty good collector value," Williams said.

for the most part, a recount is still going on. Winfred Rose, a professor of political science at Murray State University, said the recount has to be done.

"The recount has got to be done. It's got to be done because it is in the Florida constitution," he said. "Every vote has to be recounted and it has to be an accurate count."

To ensure an exact count, the Democratic Party sent 70 volunteers to Florida to assist in the process, Jamal Simmons, deputy communications director of the Democratic National Committee, said. Close votes, Rose said, are something that is not uncommon in smaller races.

"Sometimes city council races in small towns are decided by just one vote," Rose said.

While it has not happened in a while, Rose said he was not surprised by the recount and the historic implications of the election.

"Sure, it can happen — there have been close elections throughout history," Rose said. "That is why every vote counts."

the story first, than the actual matter at hand, she said.

How Bush was portrayed through the media was not accurate, she said. Living in Austin for around 20 years, she said she knew the real Bush.

"His record on human services is despicable," she said. "We just don't understand it."

She didn't understand how someone with his record could be portrayed as he was in the media. She was also upset that the Electoral College could determine Bush the winner when Gore possessed the greatest popular vote.

"Is a vote just a token — does it have any meaning?" she said.

Another Austin resident agreed.

"It just seems like a waste," said Rose Lyle.

Radle said she had never lived in the same town as a presidential candidate, and that she looked at the media differently now.

"Being close to it, you see how it really is," she said. "You see what he doesn't do. You start to ask, how can Bush lead a nation?"

She said not only did she think Bush's human service record was despicable, but also his handling of the great numbers of homeless people in Austin.

"There's extensive hopelessness here and he ignores it," Radle said. "There are people sleeping on the back steps of the the capitol every day."

Even though the state's vote went to Bush, she said many people in Travis County — where the capitol is located — didn't vote that way.

"Especially in Travis County, there's a bigger holdout on Bush than in the rest of the state cause he's right here in your back yard," she said. "You know what he really does and says."

She said the experience of being so close to the election educated her on the media. She said everywhere she looked there were media vans, satellite dishes and what she described as SWAT teams on every corner.

"I had no idea it would be this heavily covered," she said. "It was like someone came and put up a little city within the city."

Speakers help K-State radio celebrate 50th anniversary

CLIF PALMBERG/Collegian

Kevin Kletzman, sports anchor for WDAF-TV in Kansas City, talks about sports broadcasting in the 21st century with Mitch Holthus, Greg Sharpe and Brian Smoller on Wednesday morning in the Union Big 12 Room.

A rocky past, including a devastating fire and unstable station locations, couldn't keep KSDB-FM 91.9, K-State's radio station, from celebrating a half century of radio.

The station was honored Wednesday with a luncheon and two panel discussions concentrating on sports broadcasting in the 21st century and radio surviving the Internet surge.

"It's a remarkable position and high time for the radio station," said Todd Simon, director of the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communication. "I emphasize 50 years of student broadcasting. What you're hearing is based on student sweat and effort."

Mitch Holthus, voice of the Kansas City Chiefs, was the keynote speaker during the luncheon. He related his personal experiences as a member of the KSDB staff and delved into memories of the station.

"At Kansas State, I learned not to quit — it's K-State style," Holthus said.

Holthus said KSDB is the laboratory of aspiring broadcasters.

"Kansas State graduates are valuable," he said. "They're the kind of people employers want."

Holthus said the defining moment for KSDB was on Dec. 13, 1968, when Nichols Gymnasium, which housed the station at the time, was hit by arsonists.

"The person in the KSDB office said, 'Due to circumstances beyond our control, we are leaving the air early,'" Holthus said of the disc jockey who discovered the fire.

Despite the loss of equipment and the entire station, KSDB survived.

"It's been KSDB's style to march on," Holthus said.

Matt Jolly, program director for KSDB, attended the luncheon.

"I think we've come a long way from 50 years ago," Jolly, junior in public relations, said. "I think we have higher goals. For the first time, we're heading up."

Jolly said working in radio can be demanding.

"It's vital," he said. "Everything you say — it's what you're painted as."

The first panel discussion, "Sports Broadcasting in the 21st Century," included four former students and current sports broadcasters including Holthus, Gregg Sharpe, Brian Smoller and Kevin Kietzman.

Holthus said sports broadcasters need to rediscover their purpose as they proceed through the next 10 years.

"Never lose sight," he said. "It's the competition in sports we're talking about and the competitor."

Sharpe, the voice of the Wildcats, said belittling the loser has become a norm.

"There's always a winner and a loser," he said. "Ten years ago, basically it was you reported what happened, and now they editorialize."

According to Holthus, areas generally closed to women are now open.

"The bright side is for women," he said. "The curtain has been open."

The second panel discussion was titled "Can Radio Survive the Internet?"

According to Steve Smethers, professor at Oklahoma State University, a quarter or all Americans have listened to an online radio station.

"Radio has always had the ability to adapt to people's lifestyles and so has the Internet," Smethers said. "So the marriage between the two is pretty natural."

Cheryl Evans, a department head at Northwest Oklahoma State University, said the Internet gives radio the opportunity to reach people from around the world with new types of programming.

Candy Walton, KSDB director, said the station has come a long way and will continue to thrive in the future.

"We're going to be there," she said. "Students run it and they know what students want to hear."

Walton said at one time the station was going to relocate in the union, however the allotted space was instead turned into a coat closet.

However, KSDB might be making another attempt to move into the K-State Student Union. The potential move is still under discussion.

"This station's been through a lot of down times, but we've always been able to come back," Walton said.

Activity center idea in need of restructuring

Vote no for the student activity center.

We are not necessarily opposed to the theory of the SAC, because it would be beneficial to students who are actively involved in organizations. However, we are opposed to how the center would be paid for — by taking even more of students' money.

The $6.50 per student per semester increase, stretched over the next 15 years, is a lot of money when other things could be done aside from building the $4.8 million SAC.

Student Senate should have proposed at least one other plan so that students could opt between them.

Instead of supporting SAC, we are proposing a resource center be built or developed. A plan such as this could benefit every student organization, not just the four cornerstone organizations and the 120 organizations that would have cubicles. A resource center, built to a much smaller scale than the proposed activity center, could serve students in the way of meeting rooms and supplies.

The resource center, without designated office spaces, would be an extension of the Office of Student Activites and Services. The center could have mailboxes, a bulletin board, phones for long distance use, copy machines and fax machines. The bottom line is we do not need an expensive center to increase communication.

It is a shame we don't have the resources to upgrade the hollow Hale Library. We don't have the resources that will help the overcrowded or crumbling classrooms. Students are late to class because they can not find a place to park. We have been told that these are not privileges; these basics we can and do expect when we pay our tuition. Yet we pay our tuition and are not granted with a satisfactory place to obtain our educations.

Student Senate should take the initiative to fix these problems.

Instead of focusing on the extracurricular portions of this university, we instead need to focus on the necessities first and foremost.

If you disagree with our stance, by all means vote accordingly. It is important to vote. Do your part and make a trek to the Union, since according to Senate, it was too expensive to have other polling places.

Do you know what is really too expensive? $6.50 per student per semester, for up to the next 15 years.

Vote no.

ELECTION ups and downs

Campaign coverage provides disappointments, worthwhile experience

STEVEN DEARINGER

With there not being an official winner as of yet, covering the presidential elections hasn't been what I expected at all.

I was expecting the largest media gathering of my life, while working in not the greatest environment, but tolerable.

The media was there, but everything else was far from that. Standing in the cold rain for almost 12 hours straight just to find out that the election was too close to call was a bit of a letdown. We waited all night long for the results to come in. When CNN announced at 1:20 a.m. that George W. Bush won, the mood of the crowd dramatically changed. People came running from all directions toward the stage cheering because they thought their man had won.

About 20 minutes later, the announcer said the governor had received a call from Gore conceding, and he would be there a little after 2 a.m. The crowd was growing tired and ready to go home, but all they wanted to see was their new president. He didn't show and didn't show. Finally, the crowd trickled out and a few yelled up at the media tower their disgust for being told prematurely that he won.

Slowly, information came back that the race was too close to call. More and more left, but the faithful stayed. At the early hour of 3:30 a.m., Gore's spokesman, followed by Bush's, said the race was too close.

This was a huge letdown, because it really didn't matter to me who won, but I, along with the rest of the media and attendees of the election party just wanted to know, so it would be over, and we could move on.

It was still an incredible experience. Talking with Time Magazine staffers, seeing other national and international media covering the same thing I was, was an experience I won't match in the near future.

Maybe in another four years, I might be covering the next election. I wouldn't be disappointed if I never got the chance again, but I don't know if it will be as historically important as this election was.

Holidays reunite families

■ Mix of family, significant others can lead to uncomfortable times, proof of relationship's strength.

The holiday season is upon us. Soon it will be time to trek home and visit the loved ones. Time to forget all the squabbles that keep people apart during the rest of the year and come together as one big happy family. You see some people you haven't seen in a while, trade some family gossip, maybe exchange some gifts and promise to do it all again next year.

MIAH WHITAKER

For some, the holidays are a joyous occasion. For others, it can become a nightmare.

Let me explain. You see, this year for the first time, I'll be splitting my holidays between my family and the family of my boyfriend. While it's true I've met his immediate family a few times, and he's been exposed to my parents and sister on a couple of occasions, those visits never lasted more than a few hours.

Somehow, we've agreed to spend Thanksgiving at the house of one of his grandmothers, Christmas Eve with part of my extended family and the rest of Christmas in Illinois with the other half of his family. I don't know about Joel, my boyfriend, but there are people in my family whom I'm just not sure I want him to meet. I'm not ashamed of them; we're not freaks. We're just eccentric.

We're more of a laid-back, anti-social kind of people. His family is friendly. Very friendly.

His family is religious. Mine is ... not.

There are other differences in our families, too many to name in this column. Let's just say there are enough differences that I'm worried about how these family gatherings are going to turn out.

I've heard enough stories about meeting the "other family" to be convinced that this might not be the best idea I've ever had. Remember "Meet the Parents"?

What if I inadvertently insult someone because I don't like the way the mashed potatoes were made? What if I say the wrong thing? Should I be truthful on my views about politics and religion or should I keep my mouth shut?

I feel like I'm about to undergo some sort of worthiness test. I don't want to make a mistake and be branded as unacceptable. I'll spend the entire visit paranoid and uncomfortable.

Why am I doing it? Why does anybody put themselves through a similar ordeal by fire?

Love.

I care about Joel enough to subject myself to a weekend of discomfort and traumatizing fear. And all I ask of him in return is that he do the same.

READERS WRITE

Constitution changeable governmental document

Editor,

I am writing in response to Emily Cochran's column about Al Gore and the Constitution. I don't agree with many of her statements about Gore, but that really isn't the point. It is her interpretation of the Constitution that disturbs me.

After reading Cochran's column, one might think she doesn't believe the additional amendments to the Bill of Rights are good. Does that mean she supports the institution of slavery or doesn't believe women should have the right to vote?

Cochran believes the Constitution to be "chiseled in stone," possibly like the Ten Commandments. She believes the Constitution is not a living document, but I believe history has proven that to be false.

The Founding Fathers were not brilliant politicians. They didn't have all the answers, and they knew that.

That is why the Constitution was made to be a work in progress. That is why they set up three branches of government. One is to make the laws, one is to uphold the laws and one is to interpret the laws.

They knew that times will change and a document like the Constitution must be allowed to change with it, if the society as a whole wants to survive. Look at ancient civilizations like the Minoans or Romans.

Why did they not survive time? Their government didn't allow them to change with the times. Our democratic society is relatively young compared to most past civilizations, but it also is one of the more successful to date. I believe the Constitution is about liberty and justice for all. Just like it says. And what if people decided in the 1860s that the Constitution could no longer be amended? Then "all" wouldn't include you or I and many other people. If Cochran has problems with Gore's politics or tactics that is fine.

I believe both parties are equally fake and misleading to the American public, but I don't believe the Founding Fathers are tossing in their graves because our Constitution has changed over the years. The basic principal of liberty is still the core to our country's most cherished document, and I don't believe any politician or political party, for that matter, will ever take that away.

to organizations has been a benefit to students.

"They can come here late at night and use the fax machine or printer," he said. "Organizations don't have to invest their money in simple office supplies. They can invest money into their programs instead."

University of Iowa's Student Union renovation in 1988 included a student activities center. The center replaced a bowling alley that students didn't strongly support. An additional $12.50 per semester student fee was added to fund the center and new dining facilities in the Union.

A student government office, conference rooms, mailboxes for every organization in the center and a computer lab open to the entire university are included in the center. Fifty-five cubicles are available, and the university has about 350 organizations.

Iowa Student Body President Andy Stoll said students have expressed the need for more cubicles and space. The central location and storage space are reasons organizations benefit from the center, Stoll said.

"Organizations in need of the central space, a phone and storage space can meet their needs by using the center," he said.

The University of Texas had its proposed student activities center rejected by a referendum vote four years ago. The center was basically another Student Union and would have cost students an additional $30 a semester. Texas Student Body Vice President Matt Hammond said students are not in favor of creating new buildings on campus for student organizations.

"We think we can improve our existing space before new Unions or activity centers are actually added," Hammond said.

Hammond said a problem for students and student organizations is the location of the Union. The Union is on the far west side of the campus, and Hammond said students have a need for the Union's resources in other parts of campus.

"It's hard for all students to get to it," he said. "When organizations need a meeting place, they have to call two weeks in advance."

A referendum vote that endorses two smaller unions will occur in the spring, Hammond said. These two centers would provide more food and beverage facilities, study areas and facilities for student organizations. Student costs for the centers haven't been determined, but Hammond said it would be less than the $30 fee proposed in the past.

One of these centers would come in the form of a facelift inside the largest campus residence hall, and the second would be in the engineering building. The residence hall is on the southeast corner of campus, and the engineering building is in the northeast corner of campus.

"A lot of students in organizations live in this dormitory," he said. "We can't just tear down the Union and build a new one in the center of campus. Hopefully, the two proposed centers will benefit a more heterogeneous population."

Privilege fee increase cause for debate over student activities center proposal

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

Student Body President Jake Worcester and Vice President Dana Pracht have been promoting the proposed student activities center for weeks, and now time has run out. Voting day has arrived, but there doesn't seem to be a clear feeling on what the students will decide.

Opinions against the center have outnumbered those for it, but that doesn't necessarily reflect the feelings of the entire student body, said Matt Killingsworth, senior in public relations and advertising.

"Every time a big vote comes up on campus, the naysayers get vocal and receive most of the attention," he said, "but the people that are for it will go out and vote."

If the measure passes, students will receive a three-story, 16,000-square-foot addition to the east side of the K-State Student Union. The center would give new offices to Greek Affairs, Student Governing Association, Multicultural Student Organizations and Union Program Council, as well as cubicles and storage space to 126 other student organizations.

To pay for the addition, students would be charged an extra $6.50 in their privilege fees, and therein lies the main opposition to the project. Students nearing graduation don't want to pay for something they won't have the opportunity to use, Lonni Grattan, junior in advertising, said.

"Personally, since I'm already a junior, I have a hard time wanting to contribute that $6.50 since I won't see the benefits," she said. "It's a good idea, but I don't think they've looked into it enough. There's a lot of places on campus that could use that money right now."

The feeling that the effort is misguided is a common one. Students might be willing to pay the extra charge if they felt it would be used wisely, Kelsey Deets, sophomore in business, said.

"I agree that we should have an activity center eventually, but I think that there are some things that the university needs more right now that would improve student lives more than the activity center would," she said.

Senate fell short with its campaigning, Killingsworth said. The reason why there haven't been more student organization presidents speaking up in favor of the activities center is because they haven't been told of the benefits they'll receive.

"Honestly, I think they haven't been told as well as they could have been. It hasn't been explained well enough how they could benefit," he said. "I think it's a wonderful idea. There are a lot of small groups that will benefit that right now, aren't getting enough publicity."

Not all students are opposed to spending money on an activities center. Many feel the extra charge is just a drop in the bucket of tuition.

"I'd be willing to spend 13 dollars a year on something else on the university," Jenny Kampling, sophomore in education, said, "like fixing up all the buildings — the stairs in Dickens Hall scare the crap out of me.

"$6.50 isn't too much to pay considering how much we pay for everything else in tuition. Most of the time, I don't even know where most of it goes," she said. "At least I know where this 6.50 is going to."

Austria, U.S. return to normal relationship

By PAULINE JELINEK
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The United States and Austria normalized relations Wednesday after a nine-month chill bought on by the rise in Austria's government of a rightist party accused of Nazi leanings.

"This is a very happy moment for Austria," said Foreign Minister Benita Ferrero-Waldner after a meeting with U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright.

But Ferrero-Waldner also repeated her government's assertion that the treatment by the United States — and sanctions imposed by the European Union and since lifted — were unjust and "should not have come up" in the first place.

The State Department said Albright and Ferrero-Waldner were "pleased with the progress the two countries are making together on a number of fronts."

It said in a statement that U.S.-Austrian relations are ready to "regain their normal, productive profile" partly because of the work Austria has done in recent months to set up a fund to compensate World War II forced and slave laborers — a fund U.S. officials helped negotiate.

At a luncheon with journalists following her State Department meeting, Ferrero-Waldner said the repair in diplomatic relations "is very important between two countries that have a lot in common." She said she and Albright had also talked about international efforts in the Balkans and the Mideast, among other issues.

There is "a good chance" that Albright might visit Vienna soon for a meeting about the Balkans, she said.

The EU sanctions were levied in February after conservative Chancellor Wolfgang Schuessel brought members of the far-right Freedom Party into his coalition government. Joerg Haider, the party's best-known figure and its former leader, had long been criticized for remarks made years ago sympathetic toward aspects of Adolf Hitler's Nazi regime.

The Clinton administration, while not responding as strongly as the Europeans, said all governments should distance themselves from the party because it has not taken a clear stand against the "politics of hate" of the Nazi era. The United States also said it would monitor the situation in Austria closely to make sure the coalition partners fulfilled their commitment to support pluralism, tolerance and democratic principles.

Now, in what she called the first bilateral meeting by an Austrian foreign minister since 1992, Ferrero-Waldner said Albright acknowledged "the positive work" that the government has done and that the "Austrian government has worked well."

She noted steps to revoke a controversial law that allows Austrians to hold bank accounts anonymously and the agreement to set up the fund for survivors of Holocaust-era forced labor.

These are issues that the United States was interested in, she noted, adding that now with improved relations there will be more give and take on subjects to be discussed and on diplomatic visits by Austrians.

The EU lifted its sanctions after an investigating committee concluded the measures had stoked the very nationalistic fervor they were designed to punish.

Under the sanctions, Austria's EU partners broke off bilateral political contacts, restricted the promotion of Austrians at EU headquarters in Brussels and cold-shouldered Austrian ministers attending EU meetings. The diplomatic measures also included boycotts of school trips, cultural exchanges and military exercises.

K-State squad takes over No. 2 position in Big 12

By SAM STIERS
Kansas State Collegian

K-State's home dominance this season continued as the Cats swept No. 23 Missouri on Wednesday night.

The Cats (17-6, 11-4) extended their home winning streak to a school-record 14 matches, and avenged an earlier 3-0 loss to the Tigers (20-5, 11-5) in Columbia by winning in three games, 15-7, 15-6 and 15-11.

Junior outside hitter Liz Wegner had 16 kills to lead the Cats, and said the difference between the two matches was the Cats' ability to dominate the service game.

"The big difference between this game and the one we played at Missouri is our serving," Wegner said.

"They couldn't handle it, and that made all the difference in the world. We pretty much dominated them because they couldn't pass and couldn't get in their offensive system."

In fact, the Tigers had trouble handling K-State's serves all night. The Cats did have 10 service errors, but scored four aces. Head coach Jim McLaughlin said his team wanted to be more aggressive with their serves and make certain people handle the ball.

Yet, no one handled the ball well for Missouri. Kristen Johnson led the Tigers with a .125 hitting percentage, and the Tigers were only able to hit .028 as a team.

"We got on their tendencies," McLaughlin said. "They hit 2 percent. They're second in the conference in hitting efficiency and they hit 2 percent against the Wildcats. We played pretty good defense, we got on them and stayed on them.

"The game plan was we were going to take some things away from them and make them beat us in areas they didn't want to. We took some seam angles away from them, and they errored down the line. We finally stayed on task and it was a function of continuously concentrating and staying mentally focused in this game."

The Cats' offense played well, too. K-State hit .254, and freshman Lauren Goehring said team members wanted to prove they were better than how they performed the last time they played the Tigers.

KELLY GLASSCOCK/Collegian

Lauren Goehring attempts to block a hit from Missouri's Kris Jensen Wednesday night in Ahearn Field House. The Cats won the match in three straight games.

"Our passing and our serving — our all around game — was better," Goehring said. "When we watched the film we were not quite happy with the way we played there, so we really picked it up."

Consequently, Missouri was on their heels most of the night, as the Cats jumped out to early leads in all three games. McLaughlin said the offense did a good job of keeping the Tigers reeling.

"Our offense was pretty good," he said. "We hit over 25 percent, and we passed OK. We scored points, we sided out and we kept pressure on them. The match down there was a lot closer and I think the difference in the match down there was we didn't make the little off plays that we made tonight."

McLaughlin said he was also happy with how the team played together Wednesday night.

"We talked a lot about sharing emotion and staying into it together — make each other better — and we did that tonight," he said. "The conversation on the court was meaningful. Girls were talking the whole match, during the play, and when you're confused, that organizes things. We did a good job with that — it may be the best we've done."

UP NEXT
K-State's next game is Saturday at KU, with the first serve set for 7 p.m.

With the win, the Cats took over sole possession of second place in the Big 12 as Nebraska beat Texas A&M, 3-1, at College Station on Wednesday.

Wegner said that while the team still has a ways to go, but being in second place is a goal the Cats have wanted to accomplish all year.

"We've been battling with Missouri and A&M for that position all season long, and we deserve it," Wegner said. "We just keep getting better and better and we need to just keep on a roll."

Women's team signs 5 players for next season

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

K-State's women's basketball team and head coach Deb Patterson continued their recruiting success by inking five Wednesday, including Kansas native Marysville High School senior Kendra Wecker.

■ Wecker, a 5-foot, 11-inch forward who averaged 23.7 points and 11.6 rebounds last year as a junior, has been rated as the top player in Kansas and one of the top-10 players in the nation by recruiting analyst Greg Swaim.

Wecker has already set Kansas high school records for state tournament single game scoring (41 points), tournament scoring (95 points) and tournament field goals made (39). She also set the Kansas record in the javelin with a throw of 169-5.

Because of her tremendous athletic ability, Wecker is expected to have an immediate effect next year, Patterson said.

"Her strength and versatility, combined with her ability to handle the basketball and shoot the jump shots and the three, combine to make her one of the nation's best coming out of high school," she said. "I expect her to make an immediate impact in our program."

Wecker was also heavily recruited by Big 12 powers Oklahoma and Nebraska, but chose K-State for several reasons, she said.

"Just because of everything — the people, the team, the coaches. It's close to home. I fit in a lot better in Manhattan than in Lincoln or in Oklahoma," she said. "I was really impressed with the coaching staff. They know what they want in the plan for the future. The players get along so well, there's no fighting on the team."

Wecker will be joined by Chelsea Domenico (Thornton, Colo.), Kari Hanson (Bismarck, N.D.), Brie Madden (Arlington, Texas) and Megan Mahoney (Sturgis, S.D.) All five have honor-laden credentials.

■ Domenico, a 5-foot, 6-inch point guard, averaged 12.1 points, 6.8 assists and 5.1 steals last year as a junior. She was a finalist for USA Today's Colorado Player of the Year and played on an AAU team that won two U.S. Junior National Tournaments last year.

■ One of Domenico's AAU teammates was fellow recruit Kari Hanson, a 5-foot, 8-inch guard. Hanson averaged 18 points and five assists per game last year as a junior.

■ Six-foot forward Megan Mahoney has already begun her senior basketball campaign and is averaging 19.5 points and 10 rebounds a game. She has twice been named a USA Today honorable mention All-American for South Dakota.

■ The final, and tallest, signee for the Cats is 6-foot, 3-inch Brie Madden. Last year, she averaged 7.7 points, 7.7 rebounds and 1.9 blocks per game. The All Star Girls Report listed Madden as the ninth best center in the country.

Wooldridge works on 2nd class of recruits

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

Head coach Jim Wooldridge and the men's basketball team introduced a signing class of three that could immediately contribute next season.

■ Headlining the class is Gilson DeJesus, a 6-foot, 5-inch guard/forward from Sao Paulo, Brazil. DeJesus averaged 22 points and 8.6 rebounds last year as a freshman at Trinidad State College in Colorado, and was the only freshman named to the JUCO All-America team.

"Gilson is a prolific scorer who gives us size on the perimeter," Wooldridge said. "He has proven over the past two years to be one of the best players in his region, and we think he can carry that level of play into the Big 12 next year."

■ The second transfer to join the team next year will be Janerio Spurlock, a 6-foot, 6-inch forward from Chipola Junior College in Florida. Spurlock netted 19 points a game and connected on 41-percent of his three-point attempts last season.

■ The final player, and lone high school recruit, is Nick Williams from Mansfield High School in Texas. Williams averaged 12 points a game last year as a junior and is listed as one of the top-10 college prospects in the state by the Texas Association of Basketball Coaches.

Flag team works to enthuse fans

■ Color guard prepares routines to excite crowd for 2nd half of football.

By LYNNE HERMANSEN
Kansas State Collegian

Women with sparkling sequined purple and black outfits twirl flags in a carefully practiced routine for a football audience of thousands almost every Saturday.

The color guard performs with the K-State Marching Band for every football halftime show, pumping up the K-State fans' enthusiasm.

"I love it," Rachel Gowler, senior in elementary education, said. "Being out on the field is exhilarating with everyone watching. There are people who thank us for our efforts."

Gowler has participated as a member of color guard for the past two years.

"I took it in high school, and I was lacking in activities to take part in here at K-State," she said. "My roommate was in the band, and I thought it would be a fun thing to pick up again."

Practices are 3:30 to 5:30 p.m. every Monday through Friday in the field area located on the south side of McCain Auditorium.

"We always have practice," Gowler said. "Monday was freezing cold, raining and sleeting. You name it, we were in it, practicing our hearts out."

She said practice on Mondays is strictly for the group to learn new routines and practice old ones, and the other days are spent with the marching band.

Kim Wedel, junior in accounting, said she has met many of her friends through color guard.

"I have made so many great friends," she said. "It has brought us closer."

Wedel also participated on her high school's color guard and decided to pursue it in college.

"I have just loved the experiences that I have attained from it," she said.

Jennifer Williams, freshman in music theater, said her experience has been great so far.

"I have met so many people that I would not have been able to meet any other way," she said.

Gowler said she has learned a lot as a member of the group.

"The biggest thing that I have learned is perseverance," she said. "You have to keep pushing yourself, especially at the end of season, because after it is all over, it is worth all the work."

Gowler said color guard has helped her out in other areas of life.

"There are so many things going on in each one of our lives, and color guard has helped me to become organized," she said. "Classes, color guard and finals coming up can make life pretty hectic."

Wedel said she also agreed that the group has been beneficial for her.

"I have learned time management skills, which is pretty crucial when it comes to color guard," she said. "Practices and games force you to prioritize things."

Gowler said she has enjoyed her experiences on the color guard.

"Last year's bowl game was a fun time," she said.

"We had a great bonding moment, even though I wish that it would have happened earlier in the season."

Williams said she also has had an enjoyable experience as a member of the color guard.

"It is a great opportunity," she said. "You get to show your school spirit, be involved in school and attend the football games for free."

New football league fails to impress fans

MIKE VIETTI

Every year as the college and pro football seasons draw closer to the end, I inevitably feel depressed.

I need my football year-round. I can't help it.

Now two men, I mean visionaries, have come to our rescue. These two schmucks, one the sports director of a network that got outbid for the rights to NFL games a couple years ago and the other a wrestling federation owner, decided to give us a new pro football league that's supposed to be more exciting than normal football.

In any event, as part of my attempt to be the best sports column writer for the Collegian on Thursdays, I thought I'd go out and get an interview with these cats.

For some reason, they didn't want me to identify them, so I'll call the network executive "Mr. Even-though-I-blew-the-rights-to-the-NFL-I'm-not-a-complete-moron-but-I'm-probably-close" and the wrestling guy will be "Mr. Making-money-on-idiots-is-all-I-know-how-to-do."

Me: Well guys, thanks for doing the interview, I really appreciate it.

Mr. E: Hey, no problem. We're having a tough time getting players, so we could use the publicity. By the way, did you ever play football?

Me: Yeah, but I wasn't very good. Anyway, how did you guys come up with the idea?

Mr. M: Well, I was sitting back watching a program of ours when I said to myself, "Hey, I haven't made people in America completely retarded by watching wrestling. We need something else." Then I put two and two together and here we are.

Mr. E: By the way, what position did you play?

Me: Offensive tackle, but I sucked. I see you just held your draft — did you get some good players?

Mr. M: A few from K-State, but we're relying on other sources.

Mr. E: Which side did you play?

Me: Both, but I was terrible. Who are some of these players?

Mr. M: Well, we're relying on a famous former wrestler to be our league star — Andre the Giant.

Me: But he's dead.

Mr. M: Oh no — that's where you're wrong. When he passed away, we had his body mummified and stored his brain in formaldehyde. A little snip here and a cut there and ta-da, starting nose tackle.

Me: He's a corpse. You can't do that.

Mr. M: We like to call them savvy veterans, not corpses.

Me: There's more?

Mr. M: More savvy veterans — sure. You'd be surprised how cheap it is to buy people who've passed away. We've got lots lined up: George Burns, we think he'll play kicker because he's fragile. Let's see, Walter Matthau — he'll be good because he's fresh. There are several others.

Me: How do you expect the "veterans" to move?

Mr. M: Have you ever been to a carnival and ridden the bumper cars — same principle.

Mr. E: Can you long snap?

Me: No, never. What about the non "savvy veterans?" Won't they get shocked?

Mr. M: Hum ... I didn't think of that. Oh well, rookie to savvy veteran all in one play. That's an advancement you'll never get in the NFL. Thanks a lot, we can use that as our selling point to get college players, then we won't even have to pay them after one game — ingenious!

Me: If you say so. Well, thanks for doing the interview. Good luck, I guess.

Mr. M: Do you know, is Ronald Reagan dead yet?

Mr. E: Have you ever been a cheerleader or a waterboy?

City/university transit again under discussion

BY APRIL MIDDLETON
Kansas State Collegian

The transit steering committee met Wednesday night to discuss progress in the planning phase of a two- or three-route community transportation system, which would also serve the university.

The committee discussed results of focus groups organized by ETC Institute, based in Olathe, Kan. A total of 48 people participated in the three focus group meetings — 16 stake holders, nine students and 23 residents.

"From the focus groups we got that community transportation is important for a lot of purposes," Elaine Tatham, ETC Institute, said. "We did find differences in student and community wants and needs for such a system, but that is to be expected."

In general, the focus groups thought public transportation should be designed to give all residents access to and from work, school and other recreational activities.

The Steering Committee discussed results of the focus groups and surveys in an effort to form preliminary routes and services.

TranSystems Corp. was hired to research transportation in Manhattan. The consulting firm has conducted surveys and organized focus groups to study community needs and interests.

The Kansas Department of Transportation funded 80 percent of the study, with the remaining 20 percent being funded by the city and the university.

The proposal estimates a cost of $1 million annually, which would be split between the city and the university. The committee would finalize a recommendation to be sent to the Manhattan City Commission in January.

"This endeavor is unique and exciting because it is the combined input of the city and K-State," Edith Stunkel, committee chairwoman, said. "Integrating with K-State makes it more complex and takes more time, but it also adds potential of creating a system that really works."

Creativity important learning tool

■ Education in fine arts important for developing well-rounded individuals.

BY APRIL MIDDLETON
Kansas State Collegian

Reading, writing and arithmetic are important elements in a quality education. However, those elements alone won't earn a student a degree or relevant life experience.

A degree from K-State requires a humanities course, which Elizabeth Moran, assistant dance professor, said is essential to create well-rounded individuals.

"The idea of a quality education is to create well-rounded individuals who are specialists in their field," Moran said.

Moran said any form of art allows students to gain experience they will be able to use in their lifetime.

"I strongly believe that the more tools an individual has in their bag the more likely they are to succeed in whatever they do," Moran said. "Art is a tool that can be transferred to any specialization."

Moran said participating in the arts helps students develop problem-solving skills and processes, especially creativity, that can be used in every discipline.

"Arts move students to think in a creative way rather than purely factual," Moran said. "Imagination and innovation are important in everything that everyone will do."

David Procter, head of the Department of Speech Communication, Theater and Dance, said the arts allow students to explore issues that other specialized classes don't focus on.

"Arts education is an education that really enhances the humanness of students," Procter said. "We believe that participating in an art form or attending performances or exhibitions exposes students to the more creative and expressive elements of what it means to be human."

The arts, Procter said, can be enjoyed for more than the face value of the art form itself. The arts allow students to be exposed to messages and emotions and reflect on their own attitudes.

Procter said whether it's music, theater, creative writing or dance, art requires reflection and creativity, qualities that help make students more complete people.

"Even when students merely attend an art function they vicariously experience a joyous or terrible moment," he said. "Students learn how to react, respond and create their own opinions on cultural, political, social or relationship issues."

Proctor said learning to learn is an important part of education. The fine arts requirement, he said, fulfills this element of education by introducing students to a course which will force them to reflect upon what they see and form their own opinion.

Michael O'Leary, junior in art, said art is most importantly about the process of thought and creativity.

"Art is a process of though that moves the mind into a different sphere of thinking. When you see a strong image, or theme, it makes you think about it in a new way," he said. "Art is about learning to think for yourself and seeing things for more than they are at face value."

HOT CIDER

Old-fashioned drink makes comeback

Fall rolls around and gradually changes into winter.

As the temperature drops outside, warm drinks such as cocoa, tea and coffee become more popular.

Another warm drink that increases in popularity during the winter months is cider.

Shelley Schierman, owner of Louisburg Cider Mill in Louisburg, Kan., said apple cider has been the drink of choice during the fall and winter seasons for years.

Schierman said there are two main types of cider: sweet and hard.

"Basically, sweet cider is equal to apple juice, and hard cider is a fermented alcohol, like an apple wine," she said.

The Louisburg Cider Mill specializes in sweet cider, but Schierman said there are huge differences between the juice customers buy from her and the juice they buy from the grocery store.

"The concentrated stuff that comes in cans has been pasteurized and homogenized, and it would never ferment in a hundred years," she said. "We only make sweet cider, but left in the right conditions, it would ferment."

Cheryl Nodar, manager of Cider Mill Farms in Elkridge, Md., said she also only makes sweet cider. She said her recipe for the perfect cider is simple.

"Squish some apples," Nodar said.

Actually, Nodar said the process of making cider is a little more complex than that. She said her system of making cider is based on the rack and cloth method of early England.

She said there are several steps, and the first includes getting a variety of apples.

Nodar said each batch she makes contains one or two tart apples, a Jonathan, and one or two sweet apples, like a Golden Delicious. She said the mix of apples used depends on the season and the desired taste.

The apples then are crushed up into what is called pumice.

"At this stage, it basically looks like throw-up," Nodar said.

After that, the apples are placed on a wooden rack and covered with a cloth. Then, several of these racks are stacked into what Nodar said is an apple sandwich.

A hydraulic press squeezes the juice into a holding tank. The cloth prevents the seeds and the core from getting into the tank with the juice. It is stored there until it is bottled and ready to be sold.

"Once the juice is bottled it can stay fresh for about five days. When it is opened it needs to be kept cold and should be consumed in about three days, otherwise it will start to ferment," she said.

While Nodar and Schierman said they try to avoid the fermenting of their product, that is exactly the effect Jeffrey House, president of the California Cider Company in San Francisco, said he shoots for.

The California Cider Company produces Ace Cider, the first commercially produced hard cider in the United States.

House said there is no single way to make cider.

"There are many basic methods. Everybody makes it slightly differently," he said. "Really, it's like making wine. It's a finely tuned process."

It's also a very old process, House said.

"Cider in North America originated when the Mayflower landed," he said.

Schierman said the cider was popular with colonials.

"In colonial times, people would squeeze apple juice into barrels. There was no refrigeration, so the juice would ferment into cider, and they would drink that throughout the winter," she said.

House said cider grew in popularity when John Chapman, or Johnny Appleseed as he is better known, began cultivating apples in the early 1800s.

"Before the Prohibition, cider was more popular than wine, beer or spirits," he said.

House said that when the Prohibition Era started, hard cider was abolished with the other alcoholic beverages. While they managed to flourish even during that ban, for unknown reasons cider all but disappeared in the United States.

House said it wasn't until the 1980s that cider began to make its comeback, and it has been regaining its popularity ever since.

"Currently, in the States, it's a $150 million industry," he said.

House said the nation consumes about three million cases of hard cider each year, and he predicts that number will increase to 20 million cases within the next 10 years.

He said he encourages everyone to indulge their taste buds this season and enjoy some cider.

Vaccinations for Hepatitis B virus available at Lafene

By APRIL MIDDLETON
Kansas State Collegian

Lafene Health Center is spreading the word that Hepatitis B is a risk that students don't have to take.

There is a vaccine for Hepatitis B, which under some circumstances is 100 times more contagious than HIV.

Vaccinations for the virus are available at Lafene and other medical clinics. Carol Kennedy, director of health education and promotion, said the vaccine consists of three shots given over six months. Lafene charges $36 per shot.

The cost, Kennedy said, is one of the things that keeps students from being vaccinated.

Jonathan Smith, senior in architectural engineering, said he definitely would consider receiving a vaccination for a Hepatitis B since it is so contagious.

"I think if it was more affordable, more students would be vaccinated for sure," Smith said. "I would call and ask my parents to help cover it, though I think it would definitely be worth it."

Kennedy said the money issue might be a problem for college students, but there are ways to cover the cost.

"That's money that students have to call and get from mom and dad, or see if it's covered by their insurance," Kennedy said. "Students have to realize though what risks they take if they aren't vaccinated."

Hepatitis B is a virus that causes inflammation of the liver. The virus can be transmitted directly through infected blood or body fluids, or indirectly by coming into contact with objects contaminated with the virus.

Kennedy said the virus is so contagious because it is possible for it to live outside of the body for up to seven days.

"The virus can be transmitted through daily routines such as sharing razors, toothbrushes, earrings or contact sports. Although these aren't always likely, it is possible," Kennedy said. "There's no need to take risks when there is a vaccine."

Kennedy said that more than anything, she wants to increase awareness that there is a vaccine for Hepatitis B. It is the only sexually transmitted disease that there is a vaccine for.

"Students should get immunizations as a precautionary measure. It is safe, there are no side effects and it works nearly all the time," Kennedy said. "It's fool proof."

Kennedy said many newborns now are receiving the first shot of the immunization, and some schools are requiring students be immunized before attending school.

"If everyone gets a vaccination, the disease can be eliminated within the next 10 to 20 years like small pox and others have been," Kennedy said.

Nancy Hardy, director of laboratory at Lafene, said that students who fear they could have been infected with the virus should make an appointment with a doctor, who then can order blood to be taken and tested for the disease.

Hardy said it could take anywhere from a few days to a week to receive results from the test. She said the charge for a general screening is $27, and there is no charge for visits with the doctor.

Kennedy said now would be an optimal time for students to make appointments to get the first shot of the vaccine, so the second could be given after winter break.

Gore camp in limbo after retracted concession call

By NICK BRATKOVIC
Kansas State Collegian

NASHVILLE — With his bid for the presidency in limbo, Vice President Al Gore addressed America in a Wednesday afternoon press conference.

"This is an extraordinary moment for our democracy," Gore said. "Joe Lieberman and I want to thank the nearly 50 million Americans who gave us their votes."

With the Florida recount looming, Gore, who was winning the popular vote, spoke about the electoral process.

"Despite the fact that Joe Lieberman and I won the vote popular vote, it is the winner of the Electoral College who will be the next president," Gore said.

Warren Christopher, who has been brought in to advise Gore campaign chairman William Daley in Florida, said the process will not threaten the country's constitutional foundation.

"We're not on edge of constitutional crisis. We are following the rules very much in the context of what is anticipated under Florida law," Christopher said. "Last night was an extraordinary event, but I have no reason to believe that we are on the edge of a constitutional crisis."

Christopher and Daley are headed for Florida along with 70 volunteers to help ensure an efficient process.

Gore called that a priority.

"We now need to resolve this election in a way that is fair forthright and fully consistent with our constitution and our laws," Gore said. "Because of what is at stake, this matter must be resolved expeditiously, but deliberately and without any rush to judgment."

Daley was optimistic about the recount.

"No question he is ahead in the electoral and popular vote," Daley said "We believe that when those votes are totally complete Al Gore will have won the election, and therefore be the next president of the United States."

Regardless, Gore said he will respect the electoral process and the winner the people choose.

"No matter what the outcome, America will make the transition to a new administration with dignity, with full respect for the people, with pride in the democracy we are privileged to share," he said.

The campaign also said some information regarding the election is still sketchy.

"There is a whole host of information that none of us have right now," Daley said. "We will not play hypothetical games."

Gore's spokespeople said 70 volunteers had been dispatched to the state of Florida, but would not elaborate on what tasks they would be performing.

Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, George W. Bush's brother, spoke at a press conference of his own where he announced he will not take part in the recount.

"We thought it would be close, never in my wildest dreams did I ever imagine it would be this close," Jeb Bush said. "We have great confidence in the independently elected bi-partisan groups of county supervisors of elections that exists all across state, as well as independently elected secretary of state."

He then called for media outlets to exercise responsibility, and said election fraud would not be tolerated.

"The stakes are high and the circumstances demand responsibility by both political parties and by each of you," he said. "Both candidates in my opinion were treated unfairly by the early projections in Florida. I would hope and expect that news organizations adhere to the high standards of accuracy."

Gore supporters gather outside the Capitol Tuesday night in Nashville.

Bush supporters await word from Florida as ballot recount continues

By NANCY FOSTER
Kansas State Collegian

AUSTIN, Texas — Gov. George W. Bush broke the silence Wednesday morning and spoke about Tuesday night's election.

"The strength of our American democracy was displayed in this exciting election," Bush told reporters. "It's one of the most exciting elections in our nation's history."

It was a close race, he said, with a great turnout. Bush thanked his supporters for all of their hard work on his behalf.

"I would also like to thank the vice president's supporters for their hard work, and for their belief and their cause," he said. "I want to assure them, if the election goes the way I think it will, I will work hard to earn their confidence."

Campaign officials said Bush was looking forward to getting the race over with, so he could begin making the transition to the presidency if elected.

Karen Hughes, Bush's campaign spokeswoman, also made a statement about Tuesday night's election results.

She told members of the news media that historically, recounts always enforce the original results.

People had been saying it would be close, she said, and they proved to be right. She described Tuesday night as amazing, and as she watched excerpts Wednesday morning, wondered if it all was a dream.

She said as the polls drew nearer to closing, they knew Florida — the deciding factor — would be neck-in-neck. She said they always were a little skeptical, but especially when the incoming reports were so close.

Karl Rove, Bush's campaign adviser, said they had expected it would be a close election.

Hughes told media that Bush planned to spend part of his day eating lunch with running mate Dick Cheney and his wife.

They hoped the final recount from the state of Florida would be completed by 5 p.m. Thursday evening.

Florida, with 25 electoral votes, will determine whether Bush or Vice President Al Gore take the seat as the 43rd U.S. President. Florida, along with Oregon, are the only two states not yet decided. Oregon, with only seven electoral votes, will not make a difference in the outcome, however. It is up to Florida.

Campaign officials said Bush would not make another public appearance or statement until the recount was completed.
